PLACE STATUES AT GRAVES

People of Budapest Have Odd Methods of Perpetuating the Memory of the Dead.

While all civilized nations either bury their dead or place them in vaults or mausoleums, there is a curious custom carried out by the people of Budapest. This is found in the large cemetery in that city which is known as the Kerepesti Kozsimer, where nearly every family in Budapest buries its dead. It is very large and contains a number of handsome monuments, especially the one to Kossuth, who is known as the George Washington of Hungary.

The visitor to that city of the dead will find at the grave a photograph, painting or statue of the person who is buried beneath each stone, an exchange states. When the family is wealthy there is the bust or a recumbent figure of the dead man or woman made from his or her latest picture, while beside it sits or stands the statue of the nearest living relative, man or woman, carved from life.

In some instances the figures of several living members of a family sit beside the grave of a parent. But perhaps the most interesting of all are pictures embedded in the gravestones covered with glass and thus protected from the weather.

Still another peculiarity is the bronze or iron lamp posts on the graves and the huge silver balls set up on many. The latter are like the colored glass balls used upon our Christmas trees, except they are always silvered and much larger. There seems to be no way of lighting the lamps, and the only inference is that they are used to light the dead to heaven or where candles may be placed when relatives or friends are offering prayers for the dead.

Piece of Ancient Meteor.

Meteorites of indicated great age are conspicuous by their absence from museum collections, and it is suggested that such specimens may disintegrate and disappear from the rocks within a relatively short time after falling. The British museum, however, has lately acquired a slice of somewhat less than a pound from a meteoric iron that is believed to represent an ancient fall. The slice is from one of two similar masses that were found in January, 1905, within a few miles of Dawson, Klondike, and that from their position deep in the oldest gravels of the district are thought to have rested there since the Pliocene age or before. From his study of the original specimens in the Museum of the Geological Survey at Ottawa, R. A. A. Johnson concluded that they are part of a single meteoric shower of Tertiary time.

A Toothsome Thing.

"I see where a poet claims to have interpreted the soul of a mushroom." "Ah!"

"In association with a thick, juicy steak, I can understand how a mushroom might lift a bard on the wings of song."
