VALUE OF A GOOD NAME.

The wisdom of the proverb that a good name is to be chosen rather than great riches never received apter illustration than in the Donkel case. However unjust the present suspicions of the community may turn out to be, it is undeniable that the young man just now is under a serious cloud. And why is it? Not because there is any direct evidence to connect him in any manner with the taking off of the father. It is because of the name he bears, his reputation in the community as a young man of violent speech and action, given to the conduct of a desperado rather than that of a law-abiding citizen. The boy has never been proved in a court of law to be guilty of any serious offense. He has never been in prison. But the bad name he has acquired by his conduct in the community comes to plague and weaken him at a time when he sorely needs supporting strength. A young man who had led an upright life would not be subjected to these suspicions. All doubts would be resolved in his favor, instead of against him.

Here lies much of the value of decent living. It also fortifies with moral courage, which is always stronger than the animal courage of the bully or braggart.

A good name does not always mean popularity; your merely popular citizen is often a person of very uncertain character. It does not mean that one must be a church member or must join a lodge; too frequently those are mere cloaks for sly villainy, which is worse than most of the open ruffianism. The man or woman who lives in respect and obedience to the laws of the country, who recognizes the rights of fellow men and is willing to work for what he or she gets, will seldom be unjustly accused of crime. Such conduct brings the good name that is more to be prized than great riches. It is often more serviceable than wealth and it is something that is attainable for all.

In this case it is to be hoped that developments will prove the innocence of the young man and that the lesson will have a good effect upon him.

We repeat it, Bend's chances for a railroad do not depend on lumber activity here. The sawmill industry, is of course, important, but that alone, even if the situation were otherwise such as to justify immediate operations on a large scale, would not bring us a railroad. It is no slight chore to build 100 miles of railroad in Central Oregon. Lumbermen will not consent to pay heavy freight charges. The lumber charges must be low, which means there will be no extravagant traffic income. The lumber interest will not consent to stand the whole cost of the railroad. If it would we would have had a road ere this. In a few years the lumber will be gone but the railroad will remain, and the money invested in it must remain there. Therefore the men who build railroads wish to be assured of the power of the country to produce permanently. With the agricultural industry on a sound footing, settlers will crowd in and bring a well-balanced development and establish profitable commerce. Manufacturing, whether of lumber or sugar or pipe-stems, should receive all possible encouragement but we should not grieve that they do not come first. Manufacturing cannot thrive where the cost of production is greater than competitive markets will warrant. People engaged in lumbering must be fed and the farms should precede the mills. Then we have a logical development and a prosperity that will abide. Let the railroad come and quicken every factor of production here, but no single factor is the whole thing. We will do more to bring the railroad by doing something for ourselves that we can do right here than we will by sitting with folded hands and wondering why the corporations don't build in and make us all rich in an hour.

When Knowles was turned down at La Grande, notwithstanding his support by the united Oregon delegation, there was much caustic criticism of Secretary Hitchcock, who was charged with responsibility for that piece of business. "Hitchcock hates Oregon!" exclaimed Senator Fulton in discussing the appointment. "His action in this case is an insult to the Oregon delegation." Senator Mitchell said Hitchcock's action in the La Grande case was merely evidence of his hostility toward Oregon because of Binger Herman. Congressman Williamson was also convinced of Hitchcock's deep-seated enmity to everything Oregonian and his determination to "instruct" the state. Knowles himself said Ex-Congressman Moody was to blame. Now it transpires that Secretary Hitchcock had nothing to do with the matter, that it was the President who did it. Now we will see the delegation proceed to swallow itself. It can't afford to be at odds with the President, even if he has snubbed it. Moody must be getting rather more than his money's worth of fan out of all this.

Talk about your radiant sunsets—did anybody anywhere ever see finer displays than have been set in our western sky in the past week? They began with a most notable one last Saturday. It was cloudy and darkness came early, but the sun got down under the edge of the blanket of clouds and made a flambeau of light during at 7:30 o'clock. The sharp crest of the Cascade range made a jagged floor for this splendid scene. The western side of all objects on the floor was lighted as if by a camp-fire. The somber clouds roiled above; the rushing river below flashed and gurgled; else all was quiet. The flaming sky gradually cooled and the sun slept. Similar scenes, though not so intense, have attended the parting day all this week. Occasionally the silence has been broken by the complaint of the moping owl and the yelp of the sneaking coyote. In all this there was impressive poetry, profound inspiration, and the deep tragedy of a dying day.

The progress toward opening the school is in all ways commendable. The means of making this progress is not altogether perfect, as few human institutions are, but it is fairly satisfactory. It is best that neither side have opportunity for arrogant or "smart" disdain for the general good or a decent method of reaching that end. It is best that there be no "sides" in school affairs. Individual opinions must differ, but honest differences of opinions will not wreck the school.

"The Puget Sound salmon crop is almost a total failure," announces our esteemed contemporary, the Arlington Record. We suspect, however, that the Puget Sound salmon crop is not so great a failure as its salmon crop this year. The salmon crop never fails on Puget Sound.

United States Commissioner J. M. Lawrence has received Copp's Mining Code and has it in his office in Bend. It is the very latest edition, having been printed and copyrighted this year and is a very comprehensive affair, embracing as it does the mining laws of Western states and of Alaska and other territories, together with the general land office regulations and mining laws of the United States. A liberal chapter on the cutting of timber for developing mineral claims within forest reserves also enhances the value of this handy little book.
