AR ZONA PRISON IS NOVEL.

OF.

Made by Blowing Hole in Wall of Rock wich Dynamite.

Out in Arizona they don't stop to put up a big pile of brick or stone and mortar when they want to build a prison, but just take a lot of dynamite and blow a hole in one of the mountains which may be handy to the town where the lock-up is needed, says the New York Tribune. The people are so accustomed to using dynamite in getting out the gold and other minerals in this part of the west that they can calculate to an ounce how much "lready,-Harper's Bazar, is needed to blow out a cell or a corridor.

After the interior is excavated two you don't look it. Tramp-I uster be or three men with crowbars and a sallor .- New York Mail. sledges make the few windows and the sheriff at Clifton, Ariz, provides for the guests whom he may have from time to time. It is just a hole in the mountain, which at this place is several thousand feet high. When the railroad was built through Clifton it was necessary to make a deep cut and the rocky wall is almost perpendiculár.

After tunneling into it the prisonmakers blasted out two cells, one of which is used for the desperate characters-men sentenced to death or for long terms. The other, nearest the entrance, is for the cowboys, miners and others who may get on a little spree and try to "shoot up" the town. As they generally come to their senses when they are sober, they are kept by themselves, and it is not necessary to mix them up with the worst prisoners.

When they made the prison at Clifton the town fathers decided that some sort of a portico ought to be provided, so the town mason got a contract to build a lean-to of adobe. This is roofed with corrugated iron, and is entered by a beavy wooden door. It is not considered a part of the prison, however, merely being used for the sheriff's office.

It is not necessary to maintain a duties without worrying himself over a possible jail break. It is only necessary to feed the prisoners, and this can be done by shoving the food under the door at the entrance, as it is raised about four inches from the ground. Then the prisoners help themselves.

"SKINNING" IN BUILDING.

Crafts Practice of Some Architects to Catch Business.

A certain church organization decided to erect a new church edifice. After carefully studying the resources and canvassing the question generally, the parties anthorized to act decided to invest $100,000 in the new church and advertised for competitive architectural plans on that basis. Of those submitted, one set of plans threw the others altogether into the shade, easily surpassing them in many regards and presenting a most alluring balt. Having seen exactly the "right thing," it was hard for the committee, the congregation, and, above all, the rector, to accept anything that fell short of the ideal that been presented to bad their -the alluring plans were accepted, and that although there must have been some doubt, notwithstanding the reassuring protests of the architect, that the bundred thousand dollar limit would not be exceeded.

The Illusion vanished when bids for erecting the church were asked for. Some of the bids received were as high as $250,000, while the lowest was $223,000. This ought to have put a quietus on those particular plans, but the drawings had produced a profound and lasting effect, that could not be easily shaken off. Consultations with the architect, followed, in which he succeeded in convincing the church authorities that, while his estimates had been a little faulty, he could make certain reductions and alterations on the constructive parts of the church, that, without detracting wear. from the grand effects that had constituted the catching bait, would bring the total cost within the limits of $140,000. The good rector and his friends and advisers do not seem to have been familiar with the mode of "skinning," and failed to realize that it is difficult to buy a two-penny cake with two farthings. Under the bewildering glare of the fascinating design they yielded to the glib assurances of the man who had already deceived them. The stated amount was $40,000, very possibly more than that, in excess of what they could afford
