A Hay Stacker.
Among several sorts of pole stackers in use is the Wisconsin stacker shown in the cut, which is credited to Hoard's Dairyman.

In this illustration the mast, A, is shown to be twenty feet long, the boom pole, B, thirty feet long. At C C will be seen braces with cleats nailed on for convenience in climbing. Foundation poles are shown at D D, which are eighteen feet long. The lower bearing is shown at E, and P P P are pulleys.

A Real Cracking Good Farmer.
I once asked a farm hand how his employer succeeded in doing so well when he only worked ten hours a day. "It's all in the management," said he. "If I had sense enough to manage as well as he does I would be the owner of a farm now instead of working by the month. I think he is the best manager I ever saw. The work goes on as steady as a clock on his place. There seems to be no rush at any time, but I know I am doing better work and more of it on this farm than I ever did in my life. He has every implement fixed to do the best work it will do, and I can tell you it is a great satisfaction to work with them. Then he is the best stock feeder I know. He feeds the horses just enough to keep them even. They are not fat as butter in winter and poor as crows in summer. When at work they have full feed, and when they stop the feed is cut down at once. He seems to have more sense about these things than anybody I ever met. The fact is, he is a real cracking good farmer!"—Fred Grundy in Farm and Fireside.

How the Mule Makes Good.
The writer by no means thinks that the mule should replace the horse on the farm. The mule's place is on the large farm, where hired help is employed. On the small farm, where one does most of his own work and has his sons to do it, the horse will likely give the best satisfaction. But where the teams have to be turned over to hired help the mule will be found more economical in that it will stand abuse better, is liable to get hurt, and improper care does it less harm. The mule will not drink more water than is good for it when warm, while the horse will be seriously hurt if watered when warm. Likewise in feeding, the mule will not get more than is good for him when warm, while the horse will. The mule will never get into a wire fence and get cut up. Even in a runaway the mule does not often get hurt. The mule is also quite free from disease, due in a large measure to the animal's care in eating and drinking. The mule is also longer lived than the horse. The breeding of mules is in some ways more profitable than breeding horses, as the mule colt needs less care, is less liable to get hurt, as it has a keen sense of danger.—W. C. Palmer, Indiana.
