The following is a tale that The but the peace and welfare of our town demands that it be recited. It is a story showing that the "gamthe mothers of the land, and their while their children are at home hungry for meat. It brings the blush of shame to our cheek, etc., etc. But the tale must be told, awful though it be. Here it is.

A short time ago one of Bend's mothers started down town early in the morning to do some shopping and purchase meat for the noon-day meal. Visiting a friends house on some errand, she found two or three other ladies present enjoying a social chat. The hostess proposed a game of Five Hundred, The Bend band took in $15 at and the ladies sat down to the all least had forgotten her children at home crying for that meat. return of that mother and wondering what sort of a dinner she could prepare without the meat. And while the mother won and lost, deftly dealt the innocent slips of cardboard and laughed and joked, the children were at home hingry and forgotten, longing for one of Hill's juicy beefsteaks.

Dreadful! Dreadful!

The secret is out. At last it is known why Tom Triplett is so successful in catching the wary trout. He has them charmed, hoodooed. A Bendite, watching recently from behind a clump of willows, saw Tom leisurely strolling along the river bank. Occasionally he would utter a peculiar, penetrating whistle and to the surprise and consternation of the watcher, each time he so whistled a fine, large trout jumped from the lucid Deschutes and dropped at Tom's feet. Since Bulletin would rather leave untold, the secret is out. Tom admits its easy when you know how.

> A thrilling story is told at Rosland about how Tom Sly shot and slew a huge bear. Sly, while driving the mail from Rosland to Crescent, was held up by a formidable grizzly. Bruin proved ugly, showed tight, and refused to give the road. Whereupon Sly took up his position in front of the team, with his trusty rifle in hand, and began to bombard the enemy. The prizzly charged, uttering bloodcurdling growls that would have turned an ordinary man's blood to ice. But not so with Sly. He stood his ground, and neatly and calmly placed eight shots right between the bear's eyes. But on came the maddened beast and grappled with the brave stage driver. A life and death struggle ensued but Sly came off the victor, the grizzly finally succumbing to his wounds. He measured 14x18 feet.

> Another blood-curdling encounter with a wild beast was enjoyed by Mr. Trobee, who killed a big congar with a hunting knife while going to his traps recently. Further par-
