A Scarcity of Farm Produce.

While everybody is anxious for a railroad and will hail its coming with delight, yet the matter of a market for farm produce is not now dependent on a railroad.

Hay is selling at a premium and there is very little of it to be had at any price. What is sold in Bend is hauled in from distant points.

Oh, but someone replies, there will be an overproduction without a railroad and then what will we do with our produce.

Nearly a year now since Harriman promised that the railroad into Central Oregon would be built "immediately."

TEACHERS' TRAINING COURSE

Knowledge is capital. It produces success, happiness and all things worth striving for.

Each year since development started at Bend, this cry of a possible overproduction has been heard.

The Trusts Win—Perhaps. From present Aldrichian indications, there will be but very little, if any, reduction in the sacred tariff under which the people are groaning.

THE TRUSTS WIN—PERHAPS.

From present Aldrichian indications, there will be but very little, if any, reduction in the sacred tariff under which the people are groaning.

These two instances are only examples of dozens of cases where the trusts are being given protection at the expense of the people.

ing the last presidential campaign there was—and is now—a genuine demand from the country at large for a reduction of tariff schedules.

Illuminating Figures.

In 1860 Washington had 11,504 people, Oregon had 62,465, in 1870 Washington had 23,053 and Oregon had 93,025.

The whole story is told in a nutshell by the above figures. Starting in 1860 with a population more than five times that of Washington, today Oregon has fully 200,000 people less than her neighbor to the north.

What are the people of Oregon going to do about it? Sit supinely by and let it go to Mr. Harriman forever?

Nearly a year now since Harriman promised that the railroad into Central Oregon would be built "immediately."

ONE WAY TO BEAT THE MAIL ORDER HOUSES.

TO no other branch of business does the village merchant give less attention than to his advertising, while, as a matter of fact, no other part of his business requires more attention, says the Anti Mail Order Journal.

The people who read the local country papers read them more thoroughly than those who read the metropolitan papers. They read the advertisement of John Smithers, dealer in dry goods, furniture, etc.

There is nothing new or sensational, not a thrill or emotion in a hundred pages of it, so it is passed by almost unnoticed. The reader may want something in the dry goods or furniture line, but there is nothing in the cold, unexciting sort of general invitation ad to make him feel that John Smithers really is the man he wants to buy from.

In another paper or magazine he reads Henry Jones' advertisement. It is carefully studied, well worded, plain, too, but it states that Henry Jones is making a specialty of a certain line of dry goods or furniture, that he is offering an especial bargain in certain lines. The price is given. It is attractive. The ad. is an invitation to call or write. It is filled with a warmth of feeling, sounds genuine and appeals to the reader. Henry Jones gets the reader's trade.

Too many village merchants look upon their local newspaper advertising as a sort of tribute they are obliged to give the local paper and not as an investment made for profit, and the copy they furnish for such advertisement generally bears out this proposition.

No greater error was ever made by them. Properly written, with love, spirit and interest in every line of his advertisement, the village merchant will find his business can be largely increased and the mail order monopoly most woefully affected.

Nothing, it has, will induce so effectively toward putting an end to the mail order evil as the publication of good, attractive advertisements in the local or home papers.
