A Work to Be Done.

If the business interests of Portland wish to assist Central Oregon in a substantial and important manner and at the same time increase their own trade field by helping to develop a new section, they can do so by bringing all available pressure to bear on the Reclamation Service to induce it to undertake at once an irrigation project in Central Oregon. The project to which The Bulletin refers is the one which contemplates the building of a storage reservoir on upper Crooked river and the reclamation of 80,000 acres, mostly in private ownership, in the Madras section. Surveys, in the nature of a reconnaissance, have already been made on this project and 23,000 acres on upper Crooked river have been withdrawn from entry by the government.

The law stipulates that 51 per cent of the receipts from land sales shall be expended in reclamation work in the state from which it is secured. Oregon is the largest contributor to the reclamation fund, and is entitled to more projects of this character than it has been given. Outside of the funds for the Klamath Falls project there is $2,500,000 in the reclamation fund that, according to law, should be spent in Oregon between now and 1912. There are two projects being considered by the Reclamation Service. One is in Malheur county; the other on Powder river. In Malheur the settlers are torn by bitter dissensions, some advocating a Carey Act, others a government project. The Service always fights shy of a place where undue friction exists. The Powder river is really an Idaho project. In Central Oregon, the government would find everything harmonious, and the settlers are anxious for it to take hold of the work. Under these conditions, the way is open for pressure to be brought on the Reclamation Service, with a strong probability that it would start the Crooked river project.

Portland should help in this matter for the very reason that it would develop a large section of country, entirely within Portland's trade zone, and thus to Portland's benefit. A government project in the Madras section would result in bringing hundreds of people into this country, and the development of one neighborhood always adds to those about it. Every section in this part of the state would benefit therefrom.

Moreover, a government project about Madras with the building of a storage reservoir on Crooked river, would mean that a million or two of dollars would be spent in this country. It would be expended largely in wages and in supplies purchased. There would be a market at a high price for all sorts of farm produce, and there would be labor in abundance for all men. This would mean continued and more abundant prosperity for all of Central Oregon.

But the greatest good would result from the inducement it would give the railroad to build into this section. The greater the population and the greater the activity in any section, the more anxious will be the railroad to reach it. Furthermore the Reclamation Service, if working on a project here, would be vitally interested in having transportation provided. It would naturally exert what pressure it could on the railroad question, and it is known that the Reclamation Service has great influence in that respect. The greatest immediate good that would result from a government project in Central Oregon, would be the inducement it would hold out to the railroad officials for the fulfillment of that oft repeated promise of "immediate construction."

The unanimous verdict of Central Oregon is that Portland is not doing what it might to hurry a railroad into this part of the state. Portland is believed to be sleepy as compared with her more progressive sister cities in the Northwest. If her business men have any desire to correct this impression, let them get to work along the line of inducing the Reclamation Service to take up the Crooked river project. If their efforts should prove successful, it would exert a strong influence, indeed, in bringing the desired railroad. And it would open a vast and rich territory to Portland's tradesmen. Does Portland want this or shall it be given to San Francisco?

Secretary Ballinger will be in Oregon during July. It's time for the people of Central Oregon and of Portland to get busy on this matter. The movement is already under way in this part of the state.

Irrigate Bench Land Near Prineville.

The first step toward the actual reclamation of 1,000 acres of bench land near Prineville was taken the first of last week when County Surveyor Rice and his crew of men began the survey for a canal that will lead water from the Ochoco at Crain's bridge over lands owned by E. T. Slayton, T. H. Lafollette and J. S. Watkins.

The Journal says the capacity of this canal will depend upon the number of inches of water allowed by the State Desert Land Board. It is estimated that a thousand miners inches of water would reclaim the lands and it is hoped to secure at least this amount. The flood water in the early spring months would yield enough and it is believed that no trouble will be experienced in securing that quantity from the board. It is thought that, judging from the sandy character of the soil a liberal application of water in March and April would guarantee good crops. Sufficient water for this purpose could easily be spared as the heavy low lands which have prior water rights, do not need water so early in the season.

Once get this ditch on the McKay bench started there is no telling where it will stop. There are thousands of acres of excellent land awaiting only the magic touch of water, that will grow anything planted.

The appeal for a new trial in the case of C. H. Erickson and wife, who were found guilty in the last session of the circuit court of Crook county, is now filed in the supreme court of Oregon. Erickson's attorney, Geo. W. Lumbermen Visit Bend Country.
W. H. Vye of Bemidji, Minn., who has been spending some time looking over his timber holdings in this vicinity, left yesterday morning for Prineville, from which point he will leave for the railroad. After visiting in Portland and Seattle, he will return home over the Canadian Pacific. Mr. Vye is an experienced timberman and lumberman, and says the Bend country is certain to be a prosperous and busy place when the large timber companies begin to manufacture their holdings. He sees a bright future for Bend.
