Bend has been getting the "real thing" in the way of winter weather during the past few days. Sunday night the lowest notch of the season was reached by the thermometer when it registered 12½ degrees below zero. This was followed by a very bright and comfortable day Monday but again Monday night the mercury began to hunt the low spots and Observer Minor's government thermometer showed the next morning that it had registered 8 degrees below during the night. We have had fully a month of good snug winter weather. "Uncle John" Sisemore states that it has been 23 years since winter set in so early and stayed so persistently as it is doing now. However, reports from all parts of the continent state that a cold and unusual winter is being experienced.
