POST MORTEM.

National politics is a diversion, a duty and a nuisance. In its acute form and triple character it is now behind us for another four years. And the whirlwind having passed, it is worth while to regard a few of its most apparent features.

The outcome of the three-cornered dual was inevitable. Little as he was known then, as compared with the other candidates, Wilson would have been elected in April or May as readily as in November. Had there been no Roosevelt bolt, and had Taft been his only adversary, Wilson would have won as handsomely. Had Roosevelt, and not Taft, received the Chicago nomination, the result would have been the same, for then multitudes of Republicans would have reinforced the Democratic host.

Another campaign fact, now patent to any observer, is this: The "Progressive Party" might better have been called the "Roosevelt Party." Its pre-selection strength was vastly overestimated. That was because it was a party of superlative self-satisfaction. Every Rooseveltian was proud of it, and wanted everyone within earshot to know where he stood; one Roosevelt man made as much political noise as four or five Wilson supporters. Roosevelt is dead, politically. Even his giant combative ability and unparalleled publicity process can regain for him neither his leadership nor resurrection of the party he created and dragged into prominence by his own sheer personal powers.

"He did not deserve it." These are the words that are on the lips of multitudes who were opposed to Taft's election. His defeat under any possible conditions in his own party could hardly have been avoided, but his pitiful showing in the electoral college is the result of forces that are not to his personal discredit.

In his closing campaign speech, Wilson said:

Everybody knows that business is going to be conducted at the old stand, not exactly in the same way, but in a very much better way, and that the firm name simply will be changed from Special Privileges & Co. to the People of the United States.

He will be a fortunate President, and we shall be a happy people, and prosperous, if he is able to bring his words true.

Young folks and old folks are beginning to plan Christmas gifts. A book is always an acceptable present for anyone, and is apt to be particularly valuable for any boy or girl, especially if it is the right kind of a book.

The other day the Oregon Humane Society, which is the state organization working for the prevention of cruelty to animals, published a most excellent list of books concerning animals, recommending them to parents, teachers and young people. Every book on the list is good. The following are particularly interesting: some of them are classics; all are well worth reading, and everyone would make a delightful and worthwhile gift: "Rab and His Friends," John Brown; "Dog of Flanders," L. D. Rance; "Wild Animals I Have Known," E. S. Thompson; "Bob, Son of Battle," Olivant; "Call of the Wild," London; "Black Beauty," Sewall. And if you haven't happened to have read them, don't get the notion that these are dry "educational" stories, or wishy-washy sentimental literary concoctions. Not a bit of it. Everyone is a lively, thrilling yarn, full of incident and interest, and just about one thousand per cent better reading than the "best seller" of today, which will be in the forgotten ash barrel tomorrow and, for the most part, should have been there yesterday.

The women of Oregon have been given the right to vote. So far as the franchise is concerned they have been invested with rights equal to those of man. The women of Bend will be the first in the state to have an opportunity of exercising that franchise. What they do, or what they do not do, will be watched with interest not only locally but all over the state. A favorite argument against equal suffrage has been: "The women will not vote if they are given the ballot." On December 3 it remains for Bend women to answer that argument as they see fit. The men of Crook county decided in favor of giving the franchise to their wives, sisters, daughters and mothers, by a vote of 818 to 728. In the state the vote stood 58,852 to 55,036. Locally the margin of indorsement of votes-for-women was very slight. If the women don't use the franchise now that they have it, those who stood with them will have cause to be disappointed, and those who opposed allowing them entrance to the ballot-box end of politics will win the universal privilege of saying, "I told you so." Clearly there is an opportunity for the women of Bend to "make good" with their new right. If they fail to go to the polls Oregon equal suffrage, in a measure, will have received a black eye at the very outset.

It will be man's dangerous privilege to challenge the fair sex at the polls, and, if he wants to be real mean, make each feminine voter declare her age.

When Ben Franklin's elder brother started a newspaper in Boston, in 1747, he was warned that "one newspaper was enough for America."

"Genius 's 2 per cent inspiration and 98 per cent perspiration," says Edison.

Bismarck's Stratagem.

While Bismarck was living at Frankfurt, early in his career, he was one day at a public table with a friend, when two young ladies who sat opposite began talking to each other in the Lottish language. From their manner it was evident to Bismarck that they were talking about him. It happened that he had once made a visit to Courland, one of the Baltic provinces, and had picked up a few Lottish phrases. When the ladies had talked and laughed for some time he whispered to his companion:

"The moment I say something to you in an unintelligible tongue take a key from your pocket and hand it to me."

The young ladies kept on, and suddenly Bismarck said in an unconcerned tone to his friend:

"I told you to do that."

The second man at once produced a key. The young ladies from Courland looked at their opposite neighbors, then at each other and blushing violently, rose and left the room.

How White China Was Discovered.

Of many incidences in which an accidental discovery revolutionized a whole industry there is none more striking than that which enabled Samuel Astbury, in 1729, to impart to pottery that white glaze which is its chief beauty. Changing, while journeying to London, to halt at Banbury, he noticed that one of his horse's eyes was badly inflamed. He consulted the hostler, who flung a red-hot flint into a basin of water, thereby easily reducing it to a powder, which he applied to the injured eye. Astbury, who had watched the process, guessed that at length he had solved the problem which had so long perplexed him. He procured a cartload of flints, had them fired and pulverized and, mixing the powder with pipe clay and water, applied it to his ware, which, after the final baking, became white and shining. This invention, which he improved upon by introducing calcined flint into the body of the ware, was soon universally adopted.—Exchange.

His One Meal a Day.

The eccentric Dr. Fordyce, a well known professor of chemistry of the eighteenth century, believed that man required only one meal a day, and for twenty years he practiced what he preached. At 4 he would present himself at Dolly's chophouse in Paternoster row, and immediately upon his arrival the cook would place a pound and a half of rump steak upon the gridiron. While it was cooking the doctor would amuse himself with some such trifle as half a broiled capon or a plate of fish and a glass or two of brandy. Then came the steak, with a full accompaniment of bread and potatoes, and a quart tankard of strong ale. This was followed by a bottle of old port, after which he would stroll to his rooms in Essex street, where he met his class and gave lectures on chemistry.—London Chronicle.
