MUCH WIND THIS MONTH

Hail and Snow, Too, That Promise Crops for The Dry Farmers.

The alternation of snow and melting weather which has been the rule so far during January is a cause of satisfaction to the farmers. In the northern part of the county plowing has been possible nearly all winter and though the precipitation has not been as great there as farther to the south it has been sufficient to make dry farming crops certain where the soil has been properly prepared.

Aside from the lack of low temperatures perhaps the most noticeable feature of the month's weather has been the high winds. Several chinooks have blown, each time clearing off the snow that happened to be on the ground, and in addition there have been heavy blows with storms. No particular damage has been done by the wind although that which blew on the night of the Vienna Cafe fire threatened to carry the flames across the street to the wooden buildings adjoining Mannheimler's store.

The snow which fell Sunday night was added to on Monday and Tuesday but yesterday afternoon it began to warm, and in the night a chinook came up which with the heavy rain that has fallen today has melted the snow away very fast.

GOVERNOR SEES TUMALO AGAIN

with a few stringers and plank laid across and needling repairs every spring, but when you dismount and go into the canal and under the bridge, to get at the bottom of it, as the Governor did, you see that in the first place the bridge rests on cement piers and that on them steel "I" beams have been laid and the plank on these.

Asks About Cost of Work. One more stop was made before reaching the headgate, this time to look over the trestle work in place and waiting for the steel flume. Here as elsewhere during the forenoon the Governor wanted to know the costs, not merely of the completed structures but of the things that went to make them—lumber, cement, labor, team hire, tools; did the contractor make or lose on his part of the job? had the state received any benefits it was not paying for? Through it all he kept comparing prices with that on other state work with which he was familiar, and it was seldom that he found a price under that which the Tumalo was paying. "Laurgaard is a good deal of a tightwad anyway," he said.

At the headgate on Tumalo creek the party found the work completed, as indeed it is everywhere on the canal except for the construction of the steel flume and the finish of a rock cut on which the contractor is now at work. In September, Governor West found a crew living at this spot on the Tumalo and the division dam and headgate under construction. Now the dam is finished, the headgate in and the canal leading from it to the beginning of the steel flume all concrete lined. This, as well as the steel flume, was not provided for in the original estimates of cost, but Mr. Laurgaard has been able to cut costs so that the improved construction has been possible with only a slight additional total cost.

On the headgate itself the Governor's attention was called to the lettering on the upper structure, "State of Oregon, 1913," one of the very few marks of the fact that the state is doing the work. Here also it was noted that all the sand and gravel for the dam and cement work had been found right on the spot on the banks of the stream.

Big Blast Set Off.

Leaving the headworks and passing back by Anderson Bros' sawmill, where the lumber for the flume construction has been sawed out, the next stop was made at the rock cut where J. J. Adams has a crew at work. Here on Thursday a two-ton blast had been set off, shaking up the rock through the whole area to be opened, and now the loose rock is being removed. That blast, Mr. Laurgaard explained, had cost over $700 in powder and drilling in preparation for its use. With this cut finished, as explained above, and the steel flume in, the canal will be ready for water.

At this point the party was joined by a party from Redmond consisting of W. S. Redmond, J. W. Brewer, Denton G. Burdick and William Phoenix and Fred N. Wallace, irrigation manager of the project, and the run was made to Camp 3 where the Governor had dinner on his visit last year. This time there were only a few men in camp and it was still early to eat so no stop was made beyond giving the Governor a chance to shake hands with the few men who were about and to look into the tents.

Just to vary things a little, the whole party took to the canal from here, sending the autos ahead, and for perhaps a mile they tramped along on the banks, commenting on the beauty of the curves and the strength of construction as shown both in the timbering for the flume and the earth work in the banks. Coming up to the machines again, a quick run was made around to Camp 4 where dinner was served. It was one of Mr. Laurgaard's 23 1/2 cent meals that he charges 25 cents for (though not to his guests to-day) but the half cent was nowhere in sight when the hungry crowd put the "23" sign on all the feed brought on. The profit pigs that Mr. Laurgaard has been raising on scraps from the table had no scraps coming to them after that crowd got through.

More to Be Desired Than Governorship.

It was in the talk before and after the meal that Governor West spoke of his plans for the irrigation works on the other side of the river. Here, he said, was an example of what the state could do. Work had been done from the beginning at an overhead expense of only about 10 per cent, and in the coming year it would show lower than that because there was a larger sum to spend and because a good portion of this expense of the past year was in preparation for the work to come. The same careful expenditure on the other side of the river would mean just as certain success. Urged by one of the party that to carry out all this work he must serve as Governor again, he said, "I would rather finish these two projects than be Governor of any state for 20 years. I have a year left and I mean to do all I can in that time in helping this work along."

From Camp 4 a run was made up the road to the reservoir site, which was viewed from the hill overlooking it, and a short walk taken over to the site of the waterway across which it is planned to carry the state road on an ornamental bridge.

The trip back to Laidlaw was made in quick time, but not so fast that the Governor did not have an opportunity to observe the apparent prosperity of the ranchers along the road and comment on the excellent appearance of their fields and buildings.

At Laidlaw a short stop was made at the project office again and an impromptu reception was held, after which the party started for Redmond for the afternoon meeting of settlers on the C. O. I. Co. project.

INCIDENTS OF A DAY

Side Lights on Governor West's Trip About The Valley.

When B. F. Nichols came up to the Governor's car in Laidlaw Saturday morning, he said, "Judge McNary is the man I want to see. Where is the Judge?" Apparently no one else had any interest for him, but when the Governor explained to him that it was not the Judge he wanted to see at all but a cousin who lived on "that ranch over in Polk county, you know the one I mean, Mr. Nichols" the old gentleman seemed to realize that it might be worth while to talk with the Governor after all.

Whether it marked the distinction between Redmond and Bend or day and night no one seemed to know, but the Governor appeared in the former town in a flannel shirt and in the other in an immaculate white one.

At one time the Governor began to feel the need of federal as-assistance in getting from Redmond to Bend, having left Redmond in the C. O. I. Co. car which broke down on the way, with V. A. Forbes, who was to meet it, nowhere in sight. Finally the state in the person of Mr. Forbes appeared and relieved the situation.

The Governor's views on political activity while in office are seen in these remarks made at one time or another in the course of the day. "I'm not looking for office. I have only one year to serve and I mean to devote it to seeing this project put through. A man in office running for office if of no good on earth. If you want a renomination you will get the people to give it to you quicker if you attend to business while in office and not go hunting the nomination."
