Forbes Makes Address, Band Plays and Three Prize Winning Babies are Picked by Bold Judges—Accident is Fortunately Averted

Towards the end of the ball game, and upon its completion, people gathered on the lawn beside Wall street and lunched. Many had their own baskets, and those who did not were cared for by the Ladies Committee, with many volunteer helpers, who kept two long tables well supplied with meat, cake, sandwiches and other "eats," while some 15 gallons of steaming coffee were consumed. The band added much with several well-played numbers.

Then H. H. De Armond made a brief and appropriate address of welcome, first calling upon the Rev. Smith for divine invocation. The Bend Glee Club Quartet, Mrs. Putnam, Mrs. Powelson, Mrs. Forrest and Miss Trautner then sang, after which Vernon A. Forbes delivered the oration of the day. Mr. Forbes' address was well delivered and well received, and besides including the usual matter expected of a Fourth of July speaker touched upon political policies.

The Baby Show.
The baby show, well handled, under the auspices of the Ladies' Committee, proved a center of interest immediately after the luncheon. Nearly 50 youngsters between the ages of one and two years were entered, and three brave men were found to act as judges, to-wit: T. E. J. Duffy, of Prineville, at present a bachelor, D. C. Thomas, of Jefferson, Oregon and L. J. Cody.

After careful deliberation this trinity of baby experts picked three winners, Billy Van Cattaow, as the healthiest baby, Maxine Dickinson as the prettiest and David Binney Putnam as the happiest. There was no appeal from the decision and everyone seemed reasonably satisfied.

An accident nearly marred the exhibition, for while the babies and many mothers were gathered on the platform where the speaking had occurred, the horses beneath broke in two, the heavy planks parted and down came the entire platform, with a shrieking mass of babies and women. By the greatest good fortune no one was hurt in the slightest.

Irrigation; its Uses and Abuses

County Agriculturist Lovett Points Out the Advantages and Disadvantages of Irrigation—Soil is Seriously Affected by Use of too Much Water

(By A. E. LOVETT, County Agriculturist.)

Irrigation has its advantages and disadvantages. With water available for application to the crops when they need it and the application of the proper amounts at the proper time, farming becomes more of a science and we have diminished the number of elements beyond our control by one. With available water and the proper use of it, we may forget the "dry" and the "wet" seasons of the humid sections of the country and their attendant worries. When we have discovered the crops best adapted to our soil and climate, we can, with the proper use of water, and proper cultivation and handling of the land, insure a maximum production.

Among the disadvantages of irrigation is the evil effects of the misuse of water. This misuse of water may apply to methods or amounts used on particular crops, which might decrease the production of that particular crop. The most important point in the misuse of water, however, is the effect produced upon the soil itself. Of course this directly affects the crops growing on it, but the effect upon the soil has only the effect of a "dry season" in the humid section and does not materially affect the soil or its capacity for growing vegetation although the production of the crop at the time upon the land may be noticeably cut short.

U. S. to Irving H. Sands patent

It is the use of too much water upon the land that does the great and more permanent damage. The character and extent of the harm done depends not only upon the soil itself but also upon the sub-soil and the strata below. In the sandy soil with a deep, coarse sub-soil and no impervious strata below, probably the least harm is done through the "waste" of water. On such land, the available plant life will simply be washed out, down and beyond the reach of the plant roots. In the shallow and heavier soils with an impervious sub-soil, probably the most harm is done. Here, the soil spaces are filled with water, the plant roots can get no air, the soil becomes "sour" and packed and dries out very quickly as soon as the water is taken off the surface. A soil of any mixture or variation of the two types above mentioned will be correspondingly injuriously affected. Under ordinary circumstances, there are no good results to be obtained by the use of large quantities of water on any soil.

The majority of our soils in this section are at least comparatively shallow. In our irrigated sections, we can already find some surface alkali and some sour soils. There are few of these spots to be found at present but both are the result of the use of too much water on the land and the number and the size of such spots will increase on our lands wherever and whenever we use too much water in irrigation, most especially where the drainage is poor.
