Baker of Portland.

official accounts of his Bend adventure:
"BEND, Ore., Aug. 29.—Today a man alone, defenseless, without clothing and without companionship, bade his friends here goodby and plunged into the virgin pine forests. There he will contrive to exist by his wits, his wonderful woodcraft and his primitive strength until September 7.
"The adventurer is Know Joles. Readers of the Journal will recognize him, and, in view of his past exploits regard his new venture with doubled interest. Thursday Joles met another nature man on the streets of Portland, both having just emerged from woodland expeditions in Southern Oregon. It is understood that Knowles, the other denizen of the tall timber, wooed at the accomplishments of Joles. Thereupon Joles, to prove his position and once and for all to put his professional competitor to shame, gathered his photographers around him, clasped his arms about the neck of the other, summoned six porters to carry his paraphernalia and his typewriters and took the first train for Bend.
"I plan to come out when the Ad men are here because I want witnesses," said Joles. "I want to prove that my exploits are real. I want to show them what can be done and made unaided in the wilderness. With so many noted witnesses, especially men noted as honest advertisers, there will be no chance for fraud."
Then this is taken from Jole's account of his first day in the wilderness:
By Know Joles.
Camp Runcombe, Aug. 30.—I have triumphed. My reputation is vindicated against the attacks of rival nature fakers. I have demonstrated beyond possibility of doubt that I am the original nature kid.
After a day of courageous suffering alone in the tall timber with no companionship but the animals and my photographers, secretary and press agent, I have established myself as the Megalithic man, and I shall write a book called "Modern Megalithia."
Yesterday, I left Bend, naked. Today I am neatly, though not gaudily clad in furs. My sinewy muscles and rich brown skin are now covered by the hides of a deer and a bobcat. In securing them I have made good my boast that I can get the hide of anything that hides and am a master of the skin game.
It was easy to kill the deer. I spied him resting in a stream bed. Barking gently like a small tree I approached. I was in my bare skin, so I too, resembled a wild thing. When in striking distance I abandoned my cautious tactics and boldly rushed forward, and before the buck realized its danger the little sponge soaked in chloroform was pressed to his nostrils as I sieged his left ear between here, local plans may not be discussed. Everyone here knows enough of what is going on to be sure that the Admen will have a lively two day session.

KNOW JOLIS IS HERE FOR ADMEN

Already the Portland papers are giving Bend a lot of publicity. Sunday both the Oregonian and the Journal containing generous stories regarding the excursion and the town, with pictures.

Nature Man Here.

One unique feature of the two days fun, however, is already public property. That is the presence here of Know Joles, the great nature faker. Everybody who reads the Portland Oregonian knows that Joe Knowles has just emerged from a month spent in the woods of southern Oregon, which he entered naked and where he managed to live for a month. Also, readers of the Portland Journal are aware that that paper has been giving publicity to Know Joles, another nature man, whom it alleges is the real candy kid when it comes to nature fakery.

So Know Joles turned up here last week, and Saturday went into the woods. He will emerge next Monday, when the Ad Club is here. The Journal has carried stories about him, with illustrations, and these are some of the extracts from the
