

IN TWO YEARS 116 LAKES WERE STOCKED WITH TROUT

While the people of Central Oregon have not always felt that the State Fish and Game Commission has given this section as much attention as it deserves, yet during the last three years a lot has been done toward improving fishing conditions along the Deschutes and in the Cascade mountains, highly appreciated by local sportsmen.

Concerning the work of stocking the lakes of this territory Glenn Johnson, who was of the party, writes interestingly in the "Oregon Sportsman." Through the courtesy of its editor, William L. Finley, we reprint much of it here, together with cuts illustrating trail scenes while the fish were on their way from the railroad to the remote mountain lakes.

By GLENN JOHNSON.

The second shipment, consisting of 10,000 rainbow trout, was received at Redmond July 18, 1913. The destination for these fish was Black Crater and Olalla mountain districts covered shore line provides ample feed for great numbers of fish. The large inlets will provide excellent fly casting at times when the fish may not be rising in the lake. Sparks lake, like all the other lakes that have been stocked the last two seasons, has had no fish previously.

Two thousand eastern brook trout were planted in Devil's lake, which is about a mile from Sparks. Devil's lake, like Sparks, has no outlet, though it has two creek inlets. Mr. Mohler and the writer fortunately discovered where the surplus water made its exit. At one end of the lake many floating leaves and chips of wood marked a well defined eddy. On closer examination we were able to distinguish a gurgling sound of an underground stream as it sank in the lava rocks. An Indian legend to the effect that the devil lies in wait at Devil's lake for unwary travelers causes the Indians to journey several miles out of their way in order to get past the danger.

is covered with grassy meadows. The main ridge of the mountains lies to the north and is in plain view from the water's edge. The snow-capped peaks of the South Sister and Batchelor mountain rise high above the lake on the north. Six miles south of Big Elk are located the Big and Little Lava Lakes, and the head of the Deschutes river. These two latter lakes now swarm with rainbows or rainbow trout. But Big Elk is destined to surpass these as an ideal place to camp and fish. Similar to Sparks lake, ice cold springs of water stream forth at various points around the lake. This lake was stocked with 9000 rainbow trout. Last year 1250 eastern brook trout were planted there. With the exception of these, there are no fish in the lake.

Waldo Lake an Attractive Spot.

Ten thousand rainbow trout for Waldo lake were received at Oakridge August 19. Last year 2100 fish were planted in Waldo. Reports from various sources show that the trout liberated there last season are doing well.

The number of lakes stocked in 1912 was eighty-three, and the number this year was thirty-three. The pieces planted this year were harder to reach, hence the smaller number. It is estimated that there are in the Cascade mountains in Oregon upwards of three hundred lakes suitable for trout culture. This does not include shallow lakes, ponds, or otherwise undesirable lakes. One hundred and sixteen were stocked in 1912-1913. Many others already had fish in them, and others which are south of Waldo lake have been stocked during the past summer.

Certain people have been skeptical about the stocking of mountain lakes. The lakes planted in 1912 and revisited in 1913 prove that the work has been a marked success. Reports have come in, to the effect that the fish in Olalla lake are a foot long. Lake Margery and Santian lake, near Three Fingered Jack mountain, have fish to the length of eight inches. Even Irish and Taylor lakes, which are on the very summit of the mountains, have produced fish which are seven and eight inches long. As we passed by these lakes we saw large schools in the shallow water next to the shore jumping at flies and in a thrifty condition.

The total cost of stocking these lakes has been about $2900 each season, or $4000 for the two years. The money is appropriated from the funds received for the angling licenses. People who have looked at the trout fry in the fish cans and those who have witnessed the release of the fish in the lakes, have in many cases expressed themselves in words similar to the following: "I feel like buying another fishing license to help carry on such work as this."

It will require several years for the present supply of fish in the lakes to increase in numbers to insure good sport. During the past year rainbow trout eggs were collected at Odell and Davis lakes and hatched there instead of at Donoville. The trout fry have been distributed from these points to the lakes further south. This has lessened the expense and at the same time made the work more rapid.

near the McKenzie road on the summit of the Cascades. The route chosen for the trip was from Redmond to Sisters, thence on the McKenzie road between Black Crater and Belknap Crater. On account of the hot weather, dusty roads, and few watering places, we traveled from Redmond to Sisters, a distance of twenty-two miles, by moonlight. In this way, by packing until sunrise the next morning, we were able to get the fish to Squaw creek in fine shape.

Lost Lake, now known as Linton Lake, was stocked with 4000 fish. This body of water lies about two miles off the road in the midst of a rough lava formation. There is no trail between the road and the lake. Therefore, it was necessary to cut our way as best we could through the exceedingly rough jungle of under-

Nine miles southwest of Devil's lake, by way of the High or Summit trail, lie the five Horse lakes. The outlets of these lakes empty into the McKenzie river. These bodies of water are on the summit of one of the mountains, yet the fishing in them is most excellent. The species inhabiting this vicinity is the cutthroat trout. Of all the fish we caught here, there were none except cutthroat. Several large, shallow lakes lie to the east of Horse Lakes. Only one of these is suitable for fish and in that one we placed 1000 rainbows. The Horse lake district is an excellent place in which to hunt and fish. Certain instructors from the Oregon Agricultural College spend their vacations there each summer.

brush and over lava beds. A forest ranger, who accompanied us on this trip, declared he would not go back to the lake again until a trail had been built, so rough was the traveling. Yet, the two best horses with heavy loads succeeded in making the journey. The fact that it is so difficult to reach the lake, insures the complete stocking before anglers visit this place.

was Big Elk lake, located eight miles south of Sparks lake. Big Elk is one of the grandest lakes in the entire Cascades. It is three miles long and over a mile wide. Gravel beaches extend about one-half the way around the lake. The rest of the shore line

The three Scott lakes were stocked with 2000 rainbow trout. These all lie close together and during very high water are connected with each other. Large meadows completely surround these lakes. Another thousand fish were planted in Shough lake, which is located about two miles from Scott lakes and four miles from Olalla mountains.

The remaining 2000 trout were saved to stock Three Creek Lake,
