CLOTHES AND THE MAN.

To Be Well Dressed Means to Be Attired in Good Taste.

Dress is a subject frequently in the minds of many. Some think too much about it and some not enough. No one, however brilliant in ability, even a "genius," can afford to be careless in this matter. "He is best dressed," says Trollope, "whose dress no one observes." Little touches of individuality in one's clothing are well, but it is not in the best taste to adopt any peculiar striking style that will make people in the street turn their heads for further observation.

One should beware of extremes in fashion. Means and occasion should be considered in choosing what to wear. Even the poorest garments, if clean, in order and properly worn, give a good impression of the wearer. Women should give sufficient attention to dress to decide what is suitable for the time and occasion and that it is rightly adjusted and no further attention.

To be well dressed is a passport, opening doors otherwise closed.

To be lavishly dressed betokens a shallow mind. It would appear that one thought his clothes the better part of him. Even children's dress should be thought of with care. Their clothing should not prevent free action in their play. Nor should it be so rich as to give them an idea of superiority to children less expensively dressed and so make snobs of them.

The carefully dressed man shows more self respect than the sloven.—Milwaukee Journal.

When Cruelty Isn't Cruelty.

The magistrate of the department of Seine-et-Oise, in France, once gave a decision in a claim of cruelty to a horse which is remarkable as a legal subtlety. The law provides that the offense is punishable only when committed in public. If the sore is covered by the collar, he holds, the offense is not committed in public. If it is not covered by the collar there is no cruelty. In either event the case must be discharged.
