THE PEOPLES STORE

STEVENS READY TO GO ON JOB

pirate gang will have Bob Stevens walking the plank blindfolded before many weeks are up.

The possibility of receding costs for labor, materials and supplies opens up a ray of hope for the legislators who have been looking ahead to the solving of intricate financial problems.

One of the best informed state officials on financial matters estimated the other day, after privately going over the figures ahead, that the problems may be met by the finances which will be available. His figures, however, were based on contingencies which may not arise, and what is looming on the financial horizon of the state for the next biennium is problematical, to say the most that can be said.

By a combination of numerous "its" a deduction may be reached that if there is money enough to go around the state may get through, but if there is not the state won't get through satisfactorily. That seems to be the most logical solution, and will no doubt be the basis upon which the legislature works, after it has its first few spasms in trying to straighten out the tangle.

There is little doubt but this grave problem will be the one to take up the most of the legislators' time and gray matter and the guess apparently has chances for being a good one that the tangle will not be straightened out until the 6 per cent. limitation amendment, by its own automatic growth, reaches a place where sufficient funds will be provided. When that financial millennium is reached no doubt the people will repeal the amendment. There is little hope of its ever being repealed before that halcyon day. But whatever becomes of it there are a large number of state officials who do not hesitate to declare that a mistake was made when the amendment was passed.

Indications point to the fact that the public service commission may kick over the traces in the telephone rate cases and precipitate a fight which will determine whether or not the federal government may ride rough shod over state statutes and state regulatory bodies in a time of comparative peace. The commission, during the time that actual hostilities were in progress, threw down the bars and acquiesced in the actions taken by the federal regulatory administrations, but the control of telephone and telegraph lines apparently takes on a new phase with a practical, if not actual state of peace existing.

A hearing will be held next week in Portland to determine whether or not the Pacific Telephone & Telegraph company is justified in making material increases sought under the guise of giving higher wages to operating employees. The company admits its service is a heinous offense against an entirely unoffending state, but contends that its only remedy is an increase in rates so that it may boost the wages of some decidedly underpaid girls.

The assumption seems to be that in these times of high prices the old schedule of wages for telephone operators is entirely too low for a girl to live in decency and self-respect and there doesn't seem to be much objection on the part of anyone to paying them wages that are something near commensurate with the services rendered and the cost of living.

The commission agrees that this should be done, but the members are not all sure that the phone company needs anything like the increase asked, nor is it at all sure that it needs any increase at all.

The solid fact of the matter is that it is barely possible it may be found that the present rates of the company might be reduced, the operating employees' wages raised, and still have money left for the company and the government. This is not a prediction that such will be found to be the case, but it is hinted at as a possibility.

Whatever is found, the commission will operate along the lines that it will go completely into the situation and return an order squarely on its merits.

The situation simmers down to something like this: The company filed its rates with the approval of the postmaster general, but did so illegally as far as the state statutes are concerned. Strong protests from the commission finally brought the postmaster general to a point where he conceded that the state statutes should be followed and that he thought the company had followed the regularly provided channels of procedure. He ordered the company to do this, but he did so laboring under the assumption that by following the procedure it would be merely a perfunctory proceeding and that the commission would merely issue an order approving the increases without going into the situation any further.

There is where the postmaster general stubbed his toe, because the commission is going to do nothing at all of the kind. It is going squarely into the matter on its merits, and here it seems to have the P. M. G. over a barrel, as when the merits of the case are shown up, commission members hint, the merits will be such that the esteemed P. M. G. won't have the nerve to kick over the traces if it is found that his wishes are not complied with.

As near as can be determined, without prejudging the cause, the company is endeavoring to slip something over on the patient patrons that is not entirely justified by the conditions and the commission is lying in the brush waiting to jimmy the company squarely on the coco at the first appearance of the aforesaid company's bean.

These telephone cases may be the opening wedge toward determining how far the government has control over the rights of states to regulate public utilities within their own borders, and may have an important bearing on the future of government control and ownership of public utilities.

As it is, there is not a community in the state but is waiting to see what the public service commission will do.

In the light of increases in Portland on the Portland Railway, Light & Power company, as well as of the interurban carfare rises, and increases given to utilities in many parts of the state, it is likely that with the first dawn of peace the commission will take a gouge at the telephone company. It is apparent that prices for materials, at least, will drop to a certain extent and supplies of many kinds will go the same way. The company, or the government cannot expect to hold out for long the cry of advancing costs, because costs will probably go down.

The postmaster general gave assurances when he took over the lines that he would better the revenues by increasing the volume of business, and that the way the volume of business would be increased would be by lower rates and better service. Instead the company has immediately been endeavoring to put on higher rates with a service which smells to the high heavens. If any of the government ownership bugs think that the P. M. G. is making their cause popular they should back up and go down another switch. Just ask any poor, downtrodden gink who has been asked to pungle up 10 or 15 bucks as an installation charge.

His answer would have to be printed on asbestos paper to secure the proper effect.
