Turned the Tables.

Mr. Max Eastman gives the following classic anecdote in his "The Sense of Humor" as an example of "practical humor": "Cicero tells us how his friend Nescia avenged himself upon a Roman gentleman by the name of Ennius, upon whom he paid a call. He had been informed by the maid that Ennius was not at home; and when it came about that Ennius called upon him, he stuck his head out of the window and said, 'I am not at home.' 'What are you talking about?' said Ennius. 'Don't I know your voice?' 'Why, you rascal,' said Nescia, 'I have your maid when she told me you were not at home, and you won't believe me even when I tell you my self.'"

Deductive Reasoning Failed.

Three detectives were shadowing a Frenchman who had pocketed some goods from a counter, and when they suspected to belong to a gang. After rounding a corner they found he was no longer visible, but soon came to a restaurant with the inscription "Tel on parle francais." "He'll be in there," said the first. "No," said the second. "If he thought he was being followed he would avoid going where he thought we should expect to find him." "Yes," said the third, "but he would guess we should be smart enough to think of that, and would turn in after all." So they went in and searched, but without success, for the Frenchman could not read, and therefore had not stopped.

FIRST TO FLY OVER CHANNEL

Jesuit Named Grimaldi, is Said to Have Crossed Historic Strip of Water in 1751.

Who was the first man to fly across the English channel in a mechanical device? We all think that the honor belongs to Blériot and he will retain it until adequate proof to the contrary is produced.

It is now declared, however, that this feat was accomplished 150 years earlier by a Jesuit named Grimaldi, who in the summer of 1751 flew from Cape Gris Nez to Dover, says Le Petit Parisien, Paris. (Translated for the Kansas City Star). The story goes that Grimaldi used an apparatus constructed in the form of a black eagle, which was easily maneuvered at widely varying levels.

Serious documents are in existence, it is said, both in the Gorgone library in Italy and in the British museum, establishing the truth of this extraordinary accomplishment.

Anything is possible. How comes it, however, that such utter silence has reigned since the year 1751 with respect to Father Grimaldi and his marvelous black eagle?

Coffee House and Inn.

The coffee house and the foreign mail service were both young things together. When coffee was the newest beverage and the London coffee house tables were the regular rendezvous of those who talked big business in the days of clipper ships, the foreign mail service to all continents was just beginning and ships' mail pouches hung in every coffee house of any importance.

Letters for far ports, for Africa and those lonely single settlements that were the outposts of the white man a century or so ago were generally not sent through the national postoffice, but carried to the coffee house to await the sailing of the first ship.

Matters of marine insurance were settled over a cup of coffee, too, and talk of crews and cargoes and consignments and concessions were heard at the tables. In brief, big business began over a cup of coffee.

Mexican Had Business Instinct.

During the worst of the world-wide business slump slingers—like everything else were "depressed." A wise Mexican bought up several thousand "rotors" and held them for rising prices. He is now "rolling in" heavily on his foresight, as the demand for alligator skins is constantly increasing.

The Man With a Mission.

The "man with a mission" is becoming a nuisance. Nine times out of ten he seems to be headed away from the kind of work he is best qualified to do.—Houston Post

BEND IMPRESSES FAVORABLY

To the Editor:

Everybody suffers from first impressions just as children have the measles and chicken pox. Fortunately you are not often called upon to donate valuable space for the relief of this malady except in rare cases. This is a rare case.
