One word symbolizes Negro problem in N. Y.—Harlem

EDITORS NOTE: Following is the first of five dispatches by United Press International on the racial situation in five key areas in the North—New York, Washington, Chicago, Detroit and Los Angeles.

By Gary P. Gates UPI Staff Writer NEW YORK (UPI)— If one word could be used to symbolize the Negro problem in New York City, the word would be Harlem.

Civil rights leaders on both sides of the color line agree that the removal of Harlem and all it represents from the face of the nation's largest metropolis would all but eliminate the racial tensions here.

Harlem is considerably more than a community situated in New York's Upper Manhattan. To many Negroes who live there it is less a home than a condition of life, and the name of the condition is poverty. Or, as more than one Negro leader has phrased it, Harlem is "the black man's ghetto."

Exceed One Million There are slightly more than one million Negroes living in New York City and they represent about 12 per cent of the city's population. (Ten years ago it was roughly 10 per cent and the increase is the result of Negro migration from the South as well as the exodus of the white middle class to suburbia. Since both movements show no signs of decline, the percentage is expected to continue rising.)

Nearly 35 per cent of New York's Negroes live in Harlem, and most of the others live in what might be called subsidiary Harlems in other parts of the city.

There is no law enforcing this residential segregation, but to escape here as it is in communities where segregation has the official approval of local governments. And therein lies the difference between the racial conflict in New York and the one that now is on the ramparts in the South. For unlike the South, the civil rights struggle here is not a legal problem.

Best in Nation "New York City and New York state have the most enlightened civil rights laws in the country," says Stanley Lowell, chairman of the City Commission on Human Rights. And Negro leaders would be the first to agree.

New York Negroes have no trouble exercising their right to
