Extreme fire hazard means more restrictions on where you go in the woods this summer!

This summer many of your favorite forest areas may be closed. The reason? Blowdown. More than 11 billion board feet of it stacked like kindling throughout Pacific Northwest forest lands by Columbus Day windstorms. That's almost enough wood to supply our nation with new homes for a full year. It also represents one of the greatest fire hazards in the history of our area.

Soon now, warm weather and low humidity will have dried this windfall to the danger point. The slightest spark — any source of flame — could ignite some of the worst fires on record. Foresters say that if a big fire gets started this summer, it may destroy thousands of acres before it can be stopped.

Fire Closures Essential

Because 90 per cent of forest fires are man-made, the most critical areas — both state and private — will be closed for the season by order of the state forester. Closures normally run from early July through September and sometimes longer.

These closures are essential. This year they will cover much broader areas than usual. But they are the only known way to hold the risk to a minimum. Where possible, access corridors to lakes and camp sites will be kept open, but only if they are reasonably clear of slash and blowdown.

Your Help Needed

This year fire prevention is everybody's responsibility. If you go into the woods anywhere, observe fire precaution rules carefully. Remember, the fire that never starts is the easiest to control. Never build a fire except in areas where they are permitted. Stick to established campgrounds.

Watch your cigarettes and matches. Make sure they are out before you leave them. Please respect all closed areas. Report smoke and other signs of potential fire immediately. If everyone makes it his responsibility to prevent fire, we can continue to enjoy the benefits of our natural forest resources — wood, water, wildlife, recreation and payrolls.
