U.S. scientists hope to duplicate in lab some of effects of nuclear explosion

By Daniel Rappoport
UPI Staff Writer

WASHINGTON (UPI) — Government scientists hope to duplicate in a laboratory some of the effects of a nuclear explosion.

If they succeed, the United States will find it easier to gain more knowledge on how to defend itself against ballistic missiles while still observing the new treaty which bans all nuclear explosions except those underground.

Efforts to develop a device for simulating nuclear explosions were begun before the treaty was signed. The chief purpose was accuracy.

Actual nuclear explosions would be more expensive than the simulated explosions which Army scientists hope to develop in a laboratory "pulse" reactor.

The Army disclosed plans to build a pulse reactor before a House subcommittee considering its request for $2.1 million to construct the facility during the current fiscal year ending June 30, 1964. Transcripts of the closed hearings — held in June — were made public Wednesday.

JUST GOTTA CROW

INDIANAPOLIS, Ind. (UPI) — A rooster named "Tom" crowed 71 times Wednesday to win the annual rooster crowing contest at the Indiana State Fair.

The rooster, owned by Virgil Carey, Connersville, set a half-hour crowing record Monday with 91 calls.

numerous gains, there are still overwhelming problems involved in developing an effective anti-missile missile which have nothing to do with nuclear explosions.

Among them is the ability of an anti-missile missile to choose an enemy nuclear warhead from the swarm of decoys which probably will accompany it.

At present, U.S. scientists know little about a missile's electronic guidance system once it is subjected to radiation from a nuclear explosion — whether the explosion be detonated by an enemy offensive missile or by a defensive missile. Scientists do know that the accuracy and control of an anti-missile missile would be affected by such an explosion.

no other existing or planned facility could do the job it had in mind, even though certain phases of an anti-missile system have been subject to laboratory created radiation.

Dr. Ed Minor, of the Army's ballistic research laboratory at the Aberdeen Proving Grounds, Md., testified that the special reactors were needed "to simulate a nuclear weapon burst accurately."

If this could be done — and

TIME BUYING GROWS

WASHINGTON (UPI) — Installment buying in the United States during July grew by $501 million to a total of $5.1 billion, mostly because of automobile purchases, the Federal Reserve Board reported Wednesday.

The Army apparently believes it can — Minor said information could be obtained to develop a weapons system.

Dr. Harold Brown, the Pentagon's chief of research and development, said in a letter introduced into the hearings that "the pulse reactor is one of the new laboratory devices that is essential to permit us to develop weapons that can survive in a nuclear environment."

Another witness told the subcommittee that if Congress approved the necessary funds, the reactor could be completed in about 16 months.

The Army wants to build the reactor at its Aberdeen facility. New York state, which is offering its own reactor, has planned to do the work for the Army at its facility and charge the government for the work.

The Army, however, told subcommittee that it prefers to build its own reactor. It said it in the long run it would be cheaper and that the New York reactor may not be able to meet its objectives.
