

Education board tightens up on gift, grant funds

PORTLAND (UPI)—The State Board of Higher Education Monday adopted a policy giving the chancellor's office and the board a closer control of funds from gifts and grants.

Chancellor Roy E. Lieuallen said the funds now amount to about $25 million every two years and are increasing. He noted Secretary of State Howell Appling had raised questions about "adequacy of our accounting practices" in this field.

The board said the policy would allow it and the chancellor's office closer control over procedures for handling the funds without restricting freedom of research projects.

Part of the policy said graduation, education, instruction and research are "inseparable" and research is a "high yield investment" vital to education and to industrial and business growth.

The board decided that advance approval of various research projects should be obtained from the chancellor's office so that future tax dollars may not be committed heavily.

It agreed to meet Appling's request for an internal fiscal auditing system if money is available from the 1965 legislature, but Lieuallen said the proposals did not go as far as recommended by the secretary of state.

The board learned that the state system came within 73 students of estimating this year's enrollment at the nine state institutions. The estimate was 33,809 and enrollment was 33,736. However, six schools had fewer students than estimated and three gained more than expected.

Action was deferred on a new dormitory at Oregon College of Education costing $545,850 and a heating plant costing $642,000 at the University of Oregon.

MR. AND MRS. MARK O. WARRING

Karen Newman becomes bride

Miss Karen Lee Newman, formerly of Bend, and Mark O. Warring, Longview, were married recently in the Washington city.

The bride, a 1962 Bend High School graduate, is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. Newman of Bend. Before her marriage she was employed as a secretary at the Addressograph - Multigraph Corporation in Portland.

Warring is the son of Keith Warring of Longview and Mrs. Marjorie Warring of Tacoma. He was graduated from Kelso High School, Washington, in 1962. He is employed at the Weyerhaeuser lumber mill at Longview.

The newlyweds are at home in Longview, at 1202 1/2 Broadway.

Identification of body made

PORTLAND (UPI)—The body of a woman found Sunday in a brushy area near Gresham was identified Monday night as that of Nona Christine Jackson, 28, a divorced mother of three children.

Sheriff Donald Clark said she apparently had been slain, but cause of death was still unknown. It was estimated she had been dead at least three months.

Identification was made by her former husband, Raymond H. Jackson, of Oregon City. He identified a ring found on the body as one he had given her about 10 years ago. They were divorced 13 months ago and Jackson received custody of their three girls aged 5, 8 and 9.

The young woman's hands apparently had been tied with a plastic covered wire and she was nude except for a swimming suit pulled over her arms above her head.

There were no obvious signs of fractures or wounds in preliminary studies.

Jackson said he did not know his former wife was missing until she had failed to appear for her court-authorized visits to the girls. When he read of the reports of discovery of a body he called the sheriff's office.

Sheriff Donald Clark asked for public help in tracing the last movements of the woman. The room where she formerly lived here was searched for possible clues.

Police said she had been employed last at a bowling alley as a cocktail waitress. She was reported missing June 11.

Attorney fears action may open door to fraud

OLYMPIA (UPI)—If the tolerance policy gambling referendum is permitted to go on the ballot in spite of the loss of supporting petitions, it could "open the door for all kinds of fraud," attorney John Hedrick of Seattle said Monday.

Hedrick told the State Supreme Court that if the measure is placed on the ballot, sponsors of future initiatives and referendums could assure success for their proposals by arranging to have the petitions lost or stolen.

He said the statute requiring a name-by-name check of signatures on referendum and initiative petitions is a necessary "safeguard" to the people's right of direct legislation.

Hedrick, who appeared on behalf of Louis Rouso of Seattle, urged the court to overrule Secretary of State Victor A. Meyers and block a referendum on the state law legalizing pinball machines, punchboards, cardrooms and bingo games.

Meyers certified the measure, designated as Referendum 34, to the ballot in June after the petitions carrying 82,955 signatures were stolen from a vault outside of his office.

Meyers said it was a "mathematical certainty" that the stolen petitions had contained enough valid signatures to qualify the measure for the ballot.

But Hedrick said Meyers' assumption "was not based on fact." He added, "There is no scientific relationship between this measure and any other."

Judge Orris L. Hamilton commented that Meyers was unable to check the signatures because the petitions had been stolen. So the judge said the secretary of state took "the next best step" and certified the measure to the ballot on the basis of past experience with other referendums.

Chief Asst. Atty. Gen. Robert Doran, representing Meyers, argued that the decision in this case would not set a precedent for future actions unless petitions were again stolen.

"There probably never will be another case like this," he said. He urged the court not to concern itself with what would happen if "the petitions were burned, lost or stuck in a drawer."

Judge Hugh J. Rosellini asked Doran if a decision upholding Meyers' action would not "put a premium" on losing or destroying petitions.

Doran replied that he "assumed" the secretary of state would take additional steps to safeguard petitions in the future.

William Brown, a Tacoma attorney representing the referendum's sponsor, said that "public policy demands that the certification by the secretary of state be upheld."

But, he said, if the court wished, his client, Dr. Homer Humiston of Tacoma, would be willing to circulate new petitions to requalify the measure.

"In some respects that is a proper solution," he said.

After hearing oral arguments, the court took the case under consideration.

Russians impressed after visit in Central Oregon

PORTLAND (UPI)—A group of Russian engineers appeared impressed Monday with what they saw when they toured power facilities and farms in Central Oregon.

"The problem of supplying electrical power to farms is much better taken care of in the United States than in my country," said Nikolay Chuprakov, deputy chairman of the state committee for power engineering and electrification of the Soviet Union.

Half a dozen Russians made the trip on a chartered bus as guests of Portland General Electric Co. They are in this country under auspices of the State Department and left for California today.

Chuprakov said much of what the delegation learned "will be applied to improving the lot of our people in Soviet Russia."

He also said this country was far ahead of Russia in development of steam power and that Russia had two plants which use atomic power, one of them going into operation this month and the other in November. However, he said he did not foresee rapid development of atomic power.

Course offered on Freedom vs. Communism

"Freedom vs. Communism: The Economics of Survival" is the course being offered in October for employees and their families of the Bend branch of U.S. National Bank, reports John W. Stenkamp, branch manager.

The eight week course will be conducted in discussion groups at the local branches by a discussion leader.

Materials for the seminars are made available through the U.S. National Bank education department, with discussion group leadership the responsibility of staff officers in various branches.

Case problems and other workshop exercises in the course are designed to give participants an opportunity to develop their ability to analyze practical problems concerning communism and the economic system of the United States and Russia and to help them "think out" possible solutions.

E. J. Kolar, bank president, pointed out that the course is part of the U.S. National's continuing program of education in the field of economics and government. There are no grades given in the course or records of performance, but each participant who successfully completes the course is awarded a "graduation certificate."

In April of this year, U.S. National conducted a course during a seven-week session titled, "Practical Citizenship Workshop" which attracted over 450 bank employees and family members.

Talk planned on insurance

An authority on financial and insurance matters will be guest speaker at a luncheon meeting Friday noon at Sambo's restaurant. The Central Oregon Life Underwriters Association is the sponsoring group.

A special invitation to attend is extended to certified public accountants, attorneys, and others particularly concerned with probate and trust matters.

The speaker will be John E. Stinton, a certified life insurance underwriter. He is associate professor of finance and insurance in the University of Colorado school of business, Boulder.

Persons planning to attend are asked to make reservations by Thursday evening with Robert Koble, a member of the sponsoring group.

Udall switches; LA may get 'private' BPA power supply

WASHINGTON — Secretary of Interior Udall goes before a Senate subcommittee today to urge that the government build a $37 million alternating current transmission line from the Bonneville Power project on the Columbia River to the California state line. There this power could be fed to Pacific Gas & Electric, which would take it down to Los Angeles, which badly needs more electric power.

This would be a new type of electric transmission for the United States — the long - distance transmission of direct current at very high voltages (230,000 volts in this case) as compared to the usual system of transmitting alternating current.

DC System New

Sending any electric current a long distance involves losses due to resistance in the wire. In AC transmission, this can be overcome by having booster stations along the line which can compensate for the voltage drop. But such methods cannot be used with DC current.

The Swedes first developed a system for conquering the problem with DC; in fact, it now has been so perfected that DC transmission can be more efficient than AC transmission.

The Russians borrowed the Swedish developments and have used them to start a huge grid of electric power transmission over Russia that permits power to be carried thousands of miles from distant rivers to the centers of industry. They use from 500,000- to 1,100,000-volt lines.

The U.S. so far has nothing similar. Hence the adoption of the system in the Pacific Northwest clearly involves unusual risks; there can be serious difficulties before the system works properly. International Utilities willingness to assume these risks thus becomes more impressive, especially in contrast to PG & E's no-risk government - subsidized proposal.

Further, when the system is perfected in the U.S., it would have great value in that it would facilitate the transmission of electric power from other generating centers — not only from huge hydroelectric projects which must be built where the water supply is, but from coal mining areas, such as the depressed areas of West Virginia and Pennsylvania, where the building of generators would help restore those regions to economic health. The coal generators, of course, would do away with the need for the expensive transportation of coal from the mines to city power companies.

All of this makes Secretary Udall's switch in favor of PG & E even more puzzling. Hitherto, he has opposed letting big private utilities control publicly-owned power in the Far West. So has the Bonneville Power Authority. So has Agriculture Secretary Freeman, whose permission also is necessary for the transmission lines to cross certain public lands.

Now Udall has changed. In spite of the fact that a year ago Congress told him to see if he could not find a private utility to do the construction at no cost to the government.

Another switch is that Pacific Gas & Electric for years has opposed the use of federal funds to build transmission lines; like most private utilities, it has wanted to keep the government out of the business as much as possible. Obviously, though, it feels a line that would benefit PG & E directly would not be government intrusion.

It will be interesting to see just how strongly Secretary Udall now backs the PG & E proposal.

PG & E would buy the power from the government, and sell it to Los Angeles, at a profit, though at a favorable rate if the California Public Utilities Commission would permit this "discrimination" against other PG & E customers.

This will be an interesting switch for Secretary Udall, who previously not only has opposed having private utilities dominate the distribution of publicly-owned power, but who has been strongly advocating a different system entirely — a high voltage direct current system which has been developed in Sweden and now is being widely used abroad, especially in Russia. Further, Secretary Udall previously had blocked PG & E by prohibiting the cutting of a 300-foot path through national parks which would be necessary for the new transmission line.

The reason for Udall's abandonment of his previous position is not clear. But it may be significant that the brother of Interior Undersecretary James E. Carr is the chief lobbyist for Pacific Gas & Electric.

However, there's more to the story. Another big company — International Utilities — has entered the picture with an offer to build the DC line which Udall originally favored all the way from Bonneville to Los Angeles — and at no cost whatsoever to the government. Further, it would operate the line on a common carrier basis: Los Angeles would contract for the power directly with Bonneville; International would transmit it at a fixed charge. It also would guarantee that the DC line would work successfully, and would agree to pay a penalty for each day that it did not. At the end of 40 years, the DC line would become the property of the city of Los Angeles.

White elephant sale is held

A white elephant sale raised money for the treasury of the Bend Business and Professional Women's Club, at a meeting last Wednesday evening. Mrs. LeRoy F. Roebuck, auctioneer, handled the large display of gifts humorously, netting a nice profit for the club.

Mrs. Ken J. Holman and Mrs. Bennie D. Russell were co-hostesses, at Mrs. Holman's home at 491 State Street.

An honorary membership card was received by the club from the Bend organization of American Field Service. A letter thanking the club for interest and support in the foreign exchange student program was read.

Mrs. William Stradley, 1015 Columbia Street, was a guest.

There will be no home meeting in November because of the Thanksgiving season. The regular BPW dinner meeting will be Wednesday evening, November 13, at the Pine Tavern.
