

Strictly for the man about home are a new battery-powered electric shaver (left) and a bar stool (right). Rechargeable, the shaver comes in two models, one for tough to regular beards and another for sensitive skins. The contemporary wood slat swivels 360 degrees, has tubular steel legs and doubles as seating for guests or at the home work bench.

Parents should work with school adviser

By David Nydick
UPI Staff Writer

Parents and students should work closely with the high school guidance counselor.

The counselor uses many tools in his work. The most important is his knowledge of the individual. He has the student's school records at his disposal, talks with teachers and interviews parents. He works closely with the psychologist, health department, teachers, and administration. He uses tests which give clues to the student's intelligence, achievement, personality, and interests.

A guidance office must keep in constant touch with the colleges, trade and business schools, industry and government. This aspect of guidance is called vocational in that it is helping the student choose the kind of work he wants to do. As you can realize many important decisions regarding the future must be made by the high school student.

The counselor also assists students with personal problems. The teen-ager is constantly facing difficult social situations. He is learning to adjust to his peers and adults. He needs someone who will listen to him with a sympathetic ear.

The total guidance program falls into two major categories, formal and informal. The formal part of the program involves regular individual group sessions. The subject matter generally is planned but is adjusted to the needs of the individual or group. A variety of jobs are surveyed as to qualifications, procedures for preparing for them, etc. Discussions are held concerning study habits, job seeking, interview techniques, applying to colleges and trade schools.

A great deal of individual guidance also is involved. Problems which are peculiar to each individual are handled on a personal basis.

The informal guidance program also is important. This is built on the relationships between teachers and students. It goes on continuously. It occurs every time a teacher talks to a student about behavior or advises him on methods of studying.

Dallas school denies cheers at death news

DALLAS (UPI) — An elementary school principal today denied nationally televised (CBS) charges by a local minister who said fourth graders "cheered" when they heard President Kennedy was assassinated.

H. G. Williams said there was no announcement about the shooting or death of the President to the youngsters. He said an announcement was read over a public address system instructing the students to go home immediately, but not telling them why.

Williams said the children may have cheered at the announcement to go home, like normal youngsters would.

Classes Dismissed

Classes were dismissed because of the assassination. Police today guarded the home of the Rev. William A. Holmes, the pastor who made the accusation. He and his wife went to an undisclosed place after threatening telephone calls were received.

A fourth grade teacher who said she understood University Park elementary school was the one Rev. Holmes had in mind, denied children there cheered at the President's death.
