Satisfactory water outlook reported for mid-Oregon

The 1964 water supply outlook for Deschutes, Jefferson and Crook counties is satisfactory as a result of heavy increases in the water content of the mountain snowpack occurring during major January storms, according to a report released today by T. P. Helseh, State

Conservationist of the Soil Conservation Service (USDA), co-operating with Oregon State University, Oregon State Engineer and others. Watershed soils are still only partly recharged with moisture but stored water supplies are satisfactory.

Water content of the snowpack increased rapidly from the 41 per cent average of January 1 to February 1 figures of 88 per cent on the Crooked River and 102 per cent on Deschutes watersheds.

Moisture in watershed soils under the snowpack increased only slightly during January and remains at 70 per cent of capacity which means some snowmelt water will be absorbed, as runoff begins.

Crooked River reservoirs, Ochoco and Prineville, contain 23,400 and 104,500 acre feet as of February 1. Prineville storage will soon be reduced to about 93,000 after gate repairs are completed. Total water available will provide adequate supplies for irrigation next summer.

Deschutes River reservoirs now contain the following satisfactory amounts of irrigation water: Wickiup, 146,400 acre feet; Crescent Lake, 50,100 acre feet; and Crane Prairie (not measured) probably about 35,000 acre feet or more.

Flow of the Deschutes at Moody was 65 per cent average in January and has been 83 per cent in the period October 1 to date, according to preliminary data from U.S. Geological Survey, Portland, Oregon.

Crooked River is forecast to flow 185,000 acre feet or 89 per cent in the February - July period. Inflow to Ochoco Reservoir is expected to be 50,000 in the February - June period or 98 per cent average.

Squaw and Tumalo Creeks are forecast to flow 104 and 100 per cent of average, respectively which should be a good water supply.

The season of Lent will begin February 12, Ash Wednesday, with a Holy Communion service at 7:30 a.m., followed by the penitential office at 10 a.m. Communion service will also be held at 8 p.m. that day.

During the Lenten season, a series of study topics will be explored by the congregation in Wednesday evening meetings, beginning February 26, and ending March 25, on the Wednesday before Easter, according to Rev. John Grez, rector.
