Simona de Silvestro, right, will be teaming up with Beth Paretta to put another woman on the Indianapolis 500 starting grid this May.

Motorsports

The 32-year-old Swiss driver has competed in the 500 five times, finishing a career-high 14th in 2010 when she was named the Tony Renner Firestone Rising Star Award recipient. De Silvestro also has competed in Australian Supercars, Formula E and IMSA SportsCars and served as a development driver in Formula One. Since 2019, she's been a factory driver for Porsche.

De Silvestro hopes to make her first Indy start since finishing 19th in 2015 with Michael Andretti's team.

"My career really took off through my time competing in IndyCar and the Indy 500, so returning to compete with Beth and her new team in alliance with Team Penske is a special and rare chance in my career," she said. "Being part of the goal of diversity and inclusion for everyone, and especially women in IndyCar, and in motorsports in general, is very important to me and how I would like to see the future of racing."

The plan also calls for women to be included in additional team operations such as competition, administration, logistics, marketing and public relations.

For Paretta, it's another chapter in a pioneering career.

She served as an executive with Street and Racing Technology and was hired at Fiat Chrysler Automobiles as the first female director to lead a performance brand and motorsports for an original equipment manufacturer. In that role, Paretta played a part in three three championship-winning seasons from 2012-14, including Penske's 2012 Cup title.

Paretta also serves on the board of Motorsports Hall of Fame of America, but she has a bigger dream.

"Our team, along with our technical alliance with Team Penske, will work hard to give Simona the best car we can provide so she can achieve her best results," Paretta said. "Competition drives us. The Indy 500 is the greatest race in the world, and one day soon we hope to have a woman's face on the Borg-Warner Trophy."
