Ed Marinaro and Betty Thomas in "Hill Street Blues"

One of the heavyweights of late 1900s television was Steven Bochco. Counting critically acclaimed, popular dramas such as "L.A. Law," "NYPD Blue" and "Hill Street Blues" on his resume, the late writer and executive producer was one of the most prolific creators of the era as well as a fixture during awards season, with 10 Emmy wins and another 24 nominations for writing and outstanding series. And that's not including all the individual laurels his cast and crew won.

Arguably, his flagship creation was "Hill Street Blues." Starring Daniel J. Travanti, Michael Warren, Bruce Weitz, Ed Marinaro, Betty Thomas and James B. Sikking, the hourlong drama followed the lives of police on Hill Street in an unnamed city. And each episode opened with a signature roll call, which wrapped up in the first four seasons with Sgt. Phil Esterhaus' (Michael Conrad) parting words: "Let's be careful out there." (Robert Prosky's Sgt. Stan Jablonski did the honors after Conrad's death in 1983).

The series, which had 26 Emmy wins and another 98 nods during its 1981-87 run on NBC, can be seen late nights on Heroes & Icons and streamed on Hulu.

"NYPD Blue" (Hulu): The struggles of the staff of Manhattan's 15th precinct were front and center of this police procedural that aired on ABC from 1993 to 2005. Based on the experiences of former NYPD detective Bill Clark (who would eventually become a writer and executive producer here), the series was acclaimed for its grittiness and realistic portrayal of the characters' personal and professional lives. "Doogie Howser, M.D." (Hulu): Bochco shifted into half-hour dramedy mode for this 1989-93 ABC series that followed the adventures of Dr. Douglas "Doogie" Howser, a child prodigy who graduated medical school at age 14 and became the youngest licensed physician in the country. The storylines mostly revolved around his balancing the demands of medicine with teenhood and the series launched the career of its star, Neil Patrick Harris, who himself was 16 when it premiered.
