SPORTS BRIEFING

BASKETBALL

NCAA to allow limited number of fans in men's, women's tournaments — The NCAA will allow a limited number of fans to attend all rounds of its men's basketball tournament in Indiana and later rounds of its women's tournament in Texas. The governing body said Friday it is permitting 25% capacity at the men's tournament venues to allow for social distancing. That figure will include all participants and essential staff along with the family members of team players and coaches. On the women's side, the NCAA will allow a capacity of up to 17% at each venue from the Sweet 16 to the Final Four. Games taking place for the first two rounds will limit attendance to team guests. In each case, attendees must wear face coverings, while cleaning and disinfecting efforts will be emphasized at venues in keeping with COVID-19 safety protocols. The NCAA said it acted in conjunction with local health officials for each tournament.

GOLF

Wind forces Genesis Invitational delay — Tiger Woods arrived at Riviera on Saturday just in time for the Genesis Invitational to be delayed by high wind. Woods, the tournament host, is not playing this year as he recovers from a fifth back surgery. He spent most of the late morning visiting with Dustin Johnson, Xander Schauffele and other players who had time on their hands. The wind was gusting to 35 mph, strong enough in such dry conditions that golf balls wouldn't stay on the green. And then a piece of communications equipment was toppled near the 14th tee, and officials halted play. It was supposed to resume after a delay of just over three hours. But as players were warming up, play was stopped again. Sam Burns, who had a five-shot lead going into the third round, was poised over his opening tee shot when the horn sounded to suspend the round. Johnson, who was five shots behind Burns, had a 15-foot eagle putt when play was stopped. Jordan Spieth, in contention for the third straight week, opened with a birdie and was six shots back.

Mariners

The Mariners are confident they are building toward that — and they have a slew of top five farm system rankings to back them up. But this is the year when prospect love has to manifest itself in tangible progress toward the ever-present and ever-elusive goal of playoff baseball.

Rarely has a season dawned with so much ambiguity for the Mariners. The data-driven predictive programs are not kind to Seattle. Baseball Prospectus' "PECOTA" algorithm forecasts a 70-92 season with a 0 percent chance to win the division. That's "zero," as in the number of postseason appearances by Seattle since 2001, a disgrace odyssey.

FanGraphs has them at 74-88, with a 2.4 percent chance to make the playoffs. ("So you're saying there's a chance?") USA Today's six-person panel of experts put the Mariners at 70-92. Statistician Clay Davenport has them at 71-91. About the only good news on the prognostication front is that almost everyone has the Mariners finishing out of last place, ahead of the Texas Rangers — a team not as far advanced in their own rebuild.

So where exactly is that ambiguity, you might ask? The analysts seem to have unanimity in their predictions of doom for Seattle. There's not much that's ambiguous about 90 losses — a total the Mariners have exceeded seven times since 2004.

Well, the Mariners believe they have breakout candidates that are flying well under the radar.

They believe their influx of youth, which figures to be parceled out incrementally during the season — outfielder Jarrod Kelenic, starter Logan Gilbert and catcher Cal Raleigh being the prime candidates to break in at some point — will provide a boost that can't be measured.

Also, the Mariners play in a division, the AL West, that doesn't have an overwhelming favorite. The defending champion As suffered considerable offseason free-agent departures (though on Thursday they did sign closer Trevor Rosenthal, a pitcher who would have fit very nicely in the Mariners' bullpen). The Astros, a playoff team last year despite finishing under .500 (29-31), just two games ahead of the Mariners, lost one of their major stars, George Springer.

The Mariners' postseason chances will rise exponentially if MLB expands its play-off field. The decision to do so last year — letting in eight teams per league instead of the usual five — was made hours before opening day. There could be a late format change again in 2021 if the union uses it as a bargaining chip to get a concession it
