Redmond man appears in court for 35 alleged sex crimes against children

A Redmond man is suspected of sexually abusing two girls over an 11-year period. Shane Darrell Kimball, 53, was arraigned Friday on 35 criminal counts related to the alleged sexual abuse of two girls from April 2006 to July 2017. He's being held without bail at the Deschutes County jail. Kimball is charged with nine counts of first-degree sodomy, eight counts of first-degree rape, 13 counts of first-degree sexual abuse, four of second-degree sodomy and one of strangulation.

He has a plea hearing scheduled April 2.

Kimball has worked in Redmond as a handyman and in manufacturing, according to Bulletin archives.

No charges in Catlin Gabel sex abuse scandal

BY NOELLE CROMBIE

The Washington County District Attorney's Office will not pursue charges against anyone involved in the sex abuse scandal that rocked Catlin Gabel School, though prosecutors did conclude that some former administrators at the elite private school "failed in their duties" to protect students. A two-page memo provided Thursday to The Oregonian in response to a public records request spells out the decision, citing the statute of limitations and the deaths of two key alleged perpetrators of abuse. Senior Deputy District Attorney Andrew Pulver conducted the review of the Washington County Sheriff's Office investigation into the allegations that former teachers and other staff members sexually abused, groped or had sex with students in the past four decades. The school's own explosive 2019 report found that the allegations involved at least nine former teachers and staff members at the school. It also listed complaints or allegations of abuse against another dozen former faculty members and coaches that could not be corroborated. The exact number of victims, many now in their 50s and 60s, may never be known. Gilion Dumas, who represents more than 20 former Catlin Gabel students who allege abuse by former faculty, said her clients are disappointed that no one will face prosecution largely due to the statute of limitations. So far, 18 of her clients have sued the school.

Specifically, the superintendents are asking the governor for three changes: Reduce social distancing from 6 feet to 3 feet, eliminate the 35-square-foot per person requirement for classroom capacity and use a 3 feet rule instead and expand the 100-person limit for student contact to 200. "We feel we can make those changes and still keep our students safe," Nordquist said. In Bend-La Pine Schools, third grade students and younger are back to full-time, in-person learning, but fourth through 12th grade students are in a hybrid of remote and in-person learning. Under the current guidelines, the older students are stuck in the hybrid model because most schools do not have the space to keep students 6 feet apart, Nordquist said. Reducing the requirement to 3 feet would make in-person learning possible, she said. Nordquist points to a study in Massachusetts that shows no difference in COVID-19 transmission between 3 or 6 feet of distance. In addition, the World Health Organization updated its recommendation to allow for a 3-foot distance, Nordquist said. "I think it's important that we look at the science beyond our own country's conclusions," Nordquist said. Dr. Dean Sidelinger, the state's top infectious-disease expert, said Friday that officials were looking at studies from around the country about school reopenings. Some indicate Oregon's mandate for students to be spaced 6 feet apart when they return to the classroom could be cut to 3 feet. No policy change is currently in the pipeline, despite the requests to Brown from school districts. The mix of classroom and remote learning has been difficult for teachers, students and families, Nordquist said. Data from the region's school districts show remote learning last year led to a negative impact on student grades and their mental and emotional health. "We have a significant number of students who were struggling," Nordquist said. Sara Johnson, Crook County School District superintendent, said all her district's schools are back to in-person learning, but she still wanted to sign the letter to the governor and show support to the other districts. "School districts need to work together in order to get all kids back in schools," Johnson said. "There are places in Central Oregon where it's just nearly impossible to bring students back with the current guidelines." Since students have returned to school in Crook County, they have reported feeling much better. They also expressed how much they were struggling with remote learning. "That is what motivates me to collaborate with others to get all kids back," Johnson said. ■ Reporter: 541-617-7820, kspurr@bendbulletin.com

At Mio Sushi, even though some tables will have to remain empty, Roach said offering more seats allows a little more wiggle room when trying to reduce the wait time. "I will take anything honestly," Roach said. "After going so many months without being able to serve any tables, any extra seating helps." Some restaurants in Bend are still holding off on letting customers dine in. An employee at Cafe Yumm in the Old Mill District said the fast-casual restaurant has no immediate plans to reopen for indoor seating. Breweries in Bend are also welcoming the move but some add they have been managing the high and extreme risk categories by offering outdoor seating. "Most people still choose to be outside," said James Watts, owner of Silver Moon Brewery. "We've done a great job of creating an inviting and warm space on the patio." Other restaurants are looking forward to the changes. Elaine Hodge, general manager of the Original Pancake House in Redmond, said the switch to moderate makes her "hopeful and optimistic" that Deschutes County is on pace to a return toward normality. "Just getting into the moderate range shows that we are hopefully turning a corner," said Hodge. "As more people get vaccinated in our community, that just helps that process along."

For the past five weeks, the Pancake House was open but only permitted to seat 35 people at a time. On weekends the wait to get inside was an hour and a half. Now that 65 people can sit inside, Hodge thinks the weekend wait time will drop to 20 or 30 minutes. "The wait will be reduced immensely on the weekends," said Hodge. Despite the long waits, Hodge said the community has been supportive. "We have seen a really big outpouring from the community. They have really supported us very well," she said. The lowering of restrictions is certain to help gyms, athletic clubs and fitness centers. The Bend Athletic Club in the southwest part of the city was closed for nearly six months over the past year to comply with Gov. Kate Brown's COVID-19 orders. The sporadic closures "significantly impacted membership level," said Kip Heilman, the club's manager. At the moderate risk level, the club can now have 400 members working out in the 135,000-square-foot facility. But Heilman said the loss of so many members means that he doesn't expect to have more than 40 or 50 people in the building at a time. Still, Heilman is pleased that the county risk level dropped and expects upward progress. "I remain hopeful that we as a community continue to do what we can to moderate our exposure and subsequently allow more businesses to expand reopening for all customers," said Heilman. Tread Tabata, which has spin, treadmill, and workout classes at a new facility on Bend's east side, is increasing its class size from eight participants to 13. That is well short of the potential class size of 28 people, but owner Audrey DeRosa is still glad the numbers are going higher. "This is really exciting for us because we have had waitlists for our classes," said DeRosa. "The demand is high, so we are looking forward to accommodating more members." DeRosa said even 13 people per class won't allow her business to turn a profit. The multiple lockdowns have sent her finances into a deficit and turning a profit could take another year of stable business operations at full capacity, she said. Until that time she is happy just to give Bendites an outlet to work out with others. "People are excited to get back in the gym. It has improved their mood and overall well-being to work out with a community," said DeRosa. "It has improved both physical and mental health." ■ Reporter: 541-617-7818, mkohn@bendbulletin.com
