The owners of the tap-house have been fined $3,795 by April 15 or serve a 23-day suspension. The fines were increased because the violation involved more than one patron, according to the documents.

Ramzy Hattar, the owner of the River Pig Saloon in Bend and Portland, said the incident was a misunderstanding. The business's lease includes the common area, or the breezeway, and he believed the alcohol permit covered the same area and didn't need a temporary permit to serve alcohol during the event.

"The confusion is that the breezeway is in our lease as an area we can serve," Hattar said. "That's why we have large barn doors there, but we rarely open it, especially during COVID-19. We were under the assumption that it was part of our area approved by the OLCC."

Since this incident, River Pig Saloon, named after the nickname given to men who rode the logs down the Deschutes River to the mill, has sought approval from the OLCC to include this area, Hattar said.

The OLCC charged the business on Aug. 11 for these violations. The standard sanction for one of the violations is cancellation of the license, according to the OLCC. The normal sanction for the second violation was a fine or license suspension. The OLCC added two additional days to the possible suspension and fines because one of the licensed owners was involved, according to the OLCC document.

Hattar said his cousin, Shadi Hattar, had been a co-owner of the business, but is no longer. The restaurant has been in business in Bend for four years.

Brewery

While Fort George Waterfront efficiently pumps out the hits, Little Miss Texas and the Lovell Building will transition into a research and development brewery.

Michal Frankowicz, who started serving and cooking at Fort George 12 years ago, has worked his way up to head brewer overseeing a brewing staff of more than 15. Frankowicz said he's excited about the possibilities downtown now that Fort George has an efficient production facility for its flagship beers.

"There's two spots on that (downtown) block that have 19 to 21 taps, and one that has 14 taps," Frankowicz said. "We'll have an array of beer for people to come check out, for our locals to have a place to come hang out, to always have something new for them."

Next to Kingpin is a new German-made canning line that can seal more than 260 beers a minute. Speedier canning is essential for Fort George, which Nemlowill said has been selling about 95% of beer in cans since the pandemic restricted public gathering spots. The brewery has stockpiled several million cans in the warehouses in case factories shut down during the pandemic.

At the far end of the main warehouse, Fort George has built out a large cold storage. In addition to its own beer, the brewery handles distribution throughout the North Coast and coastal southwest Washington state for more than 30 craft breweries and cideries, along with a growing wine portfolio.

Brad DePuy, who started eight years ago serving beer on weekends and working on the canning line at Fort George, has worked his way up to senior vice president of operations for the company, overseeing a growing distribution business. By the end of the year, he said, Fort George will nearly double to 11,500 square feet of cold storage, allowing everything it handles to stay cold.

"And that's cool for things like kombucha or items that have to be cold-stored ... It just kind of puts quality at the top," DePuy said.

Transition

The new brewery comes at a time of leadership transition for Fort George. Nemlowill has been the sole owner since October. Harris continues working for the brewery, with plans to retire in the fall.

Zack O'Connor, who like DePuy started as a server nearly a decade ago, has also been elevated to senior vice president, overseeing human resources and the brewery's three downtown pubs.

Fort George was forced to furlough around 140 people a year ago because of the pandemic, going to a bare-bones crew of around 30. O'Connor said it was one of the worst days of his life, but that the company is back to about two-thirds of its pre-pandemic employment.

"We're still building back, and this last reopening for dine-in was good news," he said. "It was really fun to be able to recall some of our amazing staff again. And then we've actually welcomed a couple new team members as well. So we're not back to where we were pre-pandemic, but we're moving in the right direction."

One of Fort George's new hires during the pandemic was Brad Green, who worked on the production line at Astoria Warehousing palletizing labeled salmon cans. Green now helps maintain the brewery's waterfront and downtown campuses.

Green hasn't given much thought to being the lone holdover from Astoria Warehousing, besides being thankful for having a job and happy the warehouses stayed in operation.

"I think Astoria has enough hotels," he said. "Tourist dollars are one thing, but you also — unless you want to have a service economy, which is nothing but take care of tourists — you need a manufacturing base here, for tax reasons, for the economy here."

"It's nice to see these buildings being reused for close to their intended purposes, I mean as a production facility to produce whatever," Green said. "It's different businesses, different people, but it is kind of interesting to be a link to the past."

Tax

As written, the bill would have raised $373 million annually for substance abuse prevention and treatment by sharply increasing beer and wine taxes, more than doubling the state's current treatment budget. Oregon has the nation's third highest rate of untreated addiction while it ranks 47th in access to treatment, according to a report by the U.S. Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration.

Advocates and opponents of the bill agree that more addiction services are gravely needed, but they disagree on who should pay.

House Bill 3296 would have increased the wholesale beer and cider tax from $2.60 a barrel to $72.60. The wine tax would have increased from 65 cents per gallon to $10.65. Beer and wine sellers would have had to pay this cost upfront and then hope to sell enough product at an increased price to make up the cost.

Opponents from the beer and wine industry argued the tax would cripple their industry, while advocates of the bill say the industry should take responsibility for a substance abuse issue they've contributed to.

Dan Warnshuis, founder of Utopia Vineyard and Winery in Newberg, said licensing dues his winery pays each year already go to funding education about alcohol abuse. Additionally, he doesn't think targeting craft breweries and wineries will lead to a consumption reduction.

"The persons that abuse alcohol are not typically the same persons that visit our tasting rooms and drink $50-plus bottles of Pinot Noir," he said.
