SPORTS BRIEFING

FOOTBALL

Brain of former NFL player who killed 5 then himself to be tested for CTE — The brain of Phillip Adams — the former NFL player who killed a South Carolina physician, three family members and a repairman before fatally shooting himself — will be tested for a degenerative disease that has affected a number of athletes and has been shown to cause violent mood swings and other cognitive disorders, according to the local coroner. York County Coroner Sabrina Gast said in a statement issued on Friday that she had gotten approval from Adams' family for the procedure to be included as part of his autopsy.

13 Watson accusers' names to be made public — The names of 13 of the 22 women who have filed lawsuits accusing Houston Texans quarterback Deshaun Watson of sexual assault and harassment will be made public following court hearings Friday. During two hearings, Watson's attorney, Rusty Hardin, asked that the names of the 13 women, who have sued under the name Jane Doe, be publicly identified so his client can "have a chance at properly defending himself." Tony Buzbee, the lawyer for the 22 women, argued against releasing their names, saying doing so could put their lives in danger. At a news conference Friday afternoon, Hardin said that during some of the massages "some sexual activity would have taken place" but that "never at any time under any circumstances did this young man ever engage in anything that was not mutually desired by the other party."

Ross

But in February 2019, she crashed during a downhill training run at the World Championships in Sweden and injured her left knee. Ross said she briefly pondered retirement then, but eventually made the decision to just take the entire 2019-20 season off. Then she reinjured the left knee during giant slalom training in November 2020. She returned in January of this year for her final World Cup races, placing 23rd for her final finish on the circuit. "What a joy it has been to fly freely down the mountain," Ross posted on her social media. "Through gates, over jumps, in the wild; letting go of any sense of control. There is no other place I will find such
