ing visitor impact on the wilderness. Over the next 12, he created and implemented a visitor information education program. In 2003, he was tapped to lead the team overseeing wilderness, recreation, heritage, lands, minerals and roads in the Bend-Fort Rock Ranger District.

Two years later, he retired from the Forest Service at 62, but Joslin hardly slowed down. Over the years, he's been active with the High Desert Museum and the Deschutes Historical Museum and has penned articles for The Oregon Encyclopedia on such subjects as Camp Abbot and the Paulina Lake Guard Station.

Joslin's first book was the memoir "Toiyabe Patrol: Five U.S. Forest Summers," published in 1993. Since, he's written numerous books of regional interest.

The History Press, publisher of "Three Sisters Wilderness," is an imprint of Arcadia Publishing, which published two of his most recent books, "Legendary Locals of Bend" (2016) and "Deschutes National Forest" (2017). Arcadia also published Joslin's book "Images of America: Bend" in 2009, a revised edition of a book originally published in 2005 by the Deschutes Historical Society.

Interviewed the day after his birthday, Joslin was philosophical about future books he might write.

"I'll have to come up with another idea that commands my attention. This might well prove my capstone, I don't know," he said. "I write what I think I know something about, and what I enjoy, and what I hope other people will appreciate and want to know about too."
