What was the biggest obstacle you have had to face and overcome in your life?

I guess that my biggest obstacle is overcoming my own fears, and that's something that I always am challenged with, but I really feel grateful for the life that I have and for not having to deal with such big problems and issues ...

You know, after I've done “Wonder Woman” I felt like I had such a big reach to people, and I just wanted to do something good, and I want to use my reach and my platforms to get to as many people and shed light on these amazing, incredible women's stories. So maybe ignite something in them and create a movement of people that just want to do good to the world. But I'm very, very lucky and grateful for being able to have this opportunity to do this.

When you understood the responsibility that you had to young women all over the world because of your celebrity, when did that hit home for you?

It keeps on hitting, but ... I really started to understand the influence that I have on people, on younger people, as soon as in 2017, as soon as “Wonder Woman” was out, by the feedback that I got and the reaction that I got from so many different people. And then you start to think about, OK, so I need to really be responsible and be truthful to anything that I spread out there to the world with my social media, with the interviews that I give because people really listen. Sometimes, I remember when I was younger and I used to give interviews when I just started acting or modeling, and I remember thinking to myself, “Who's going to listen to this? They don't care about what I have to say.” And slowly and gradually I realized that people actually listen.

I'm a mother of two girls and my belief system is very close to Wonder Woman's belief system. I'm all about love and compassion and peace and positivity, and try to make the world a better place as much as I can, and that was a very, very natural fit for me.
