It's hot, but the water's not

Just because it's hot outside doesn't mean water temperatures are warming up, too. If you're looking to cool down at a lake or river, you should take a pause before diving in.

Water in the Portland area remains chilly. Very chilly, in fact.

That poses a danger for anybody looking to get away from the heat by diving head-first into the water. Early-season swimming is dangerous because of colder water temperatures and river currents quickened by snowmelt.

The temperature in the Clackamas River near Oregon City, for example, has been in the mid-50s for the past week.

6 rescued Saturday on North Santiam River

On Saturday, Albany firefighters responded to the North Santiam River in Jefferson after six people who snagged on hazardous trees and strainers while floating downriver. A strainer is an obstruction in a river where limited water can flow through and can cause debris or people to become pinned. The water levels were shallow in portions of the river, but the currents were swift.

Firefighters used two watercraft and also deployed a rescue swimmer. All six individuals were rescued and transported to shore for evaluation by the Jefferson Fire Department.

Authorities say the Santiam and Willamette rivers are treacherous right now. Logs, brush, cold temperatures, and fluctuating river levels create unsafe conditions.

Tillamook County Sheriff's Department

More than a dozen people became stranded when two boats became stuck in the mud on Tillamook Bay about 10 p.m. Saturday.

vice in Portland is advising people to be cautious when heading for a dip. Multnomah County authorities recommend that people wear life jackets when getting in the water and refrain from drinking alcohol or smoking marijuana. Alcohol can cause a decrease in body temperature that can lead to an increased risk of hypothermia, according to officials.

The National Center for Cold Water Safety advises swimmers to treat any water temperature below 70 degrees with caution.

13 stranded when boats get stuck in mud on coast

More than a dozen people were stranded and many were rescued after two boats became stuck in mud on the Oregon Coast over the weekend.

The Tillamook County Sheriff's Office and Tillamook Fire Department responded to a report of boats stranded on mud in Tillamook Bay at about 10 p.m.

Saturday, KPTV reported. Thirteen were involved, and some were attempting to swim back to shore.

The sheriff's office said crews reached the boats and got the four "younger and coldest victims" onboard. They were taken to medical personnel at a nearby boat ramp. Four other people were brought back across the shore by a second rescue boat. The remaining five people successfully swam across before first responders arrived.

Three people were taken to Adventist Health Tillamook Hospital for treatment for hypothermia.

On Sunday morning, deputies attempted to bring boat owners to their vessels, but the water was too low. The sheriff's office planned to try again later in the day.

The sheriff's office said the tidal exchange in Tillamook County bays and estuaries can be dramatic and boats regularly get stranded on mud and sand bars.

Teen hospitalized after being severely burned imitating TikTok video

BY ARON YOHANNES

The Oregonian

A 13-year-old Portland girl has been hospitalized for more than two weeks after suffering third-degree burns while attempting to imitate a video she saw on the popular social media platform TikTok, her family said.

Destini Crane severely burned her neck and right arm during the May 13 incident and had to undergo three skin-grafting surgeries, her family said. She remains hospitalized in an intensive care unit.

The family told ABC News they are speaking out about the accident to help prevent it from happening to someone else. Destini's sister, Andrea Crane, did not immediately respond to a request for comment from The Oregonian.

Andrea told ABC News the incident happened in the bathroom of the family's home. While Destini is unable to speak to tell her family what happened, her sister said they believe the teen was attempting to copy a TikTok challenge where someone uses flammable liquid to draw a shape on a mirror and then lights it on fire.

Andrea told ABC News that Destini went into the bathroom with a candle, lighter and bottle of rubbing alcohol, which they believe exploded and set her and other items on fire. Destini's phone was still recording a TikTok video when they retrieved it, her mother, Kimberly Crane, told ABC News.

Andrea told ABC News it will likely take several months for her sister to recover and regain use of her arm and mobility in her neck, shoulders and fingers.

The family believes Destini knows she is in the hospital but doesn't fully comprehend what happened. She is able to open her eyes, but can't drink or speak, the family said.

The family started a GoFundMe fundraiser with a goal of raising $5,000 to help aid Destini in her recovery. More than $4,600 had been donated as of Monday afternoon.

In an update on the GoFundMe page Saturday, Andrea said Destini underwent a third successful skin graft surgery this week.

"Hopefully by the end of this weekend she will be transferred into the burn unit and we will be able to get a bigger picture of costs for physical therapy and what the quality of her life the next few months is going to be," Andrea wrote.

"Thank you all for your kind words, thoughts, prayers and donations," she added. "We are completely blown away and blessed by the response of the community and could not be more grateful."
