Lawmakers vote out Netanyahu, country's longest-serving leader

Los Angeles Times

JERUSALEM — In an era-ending vote, Israeli lawmakers on Sunday approved a new government, sweeping aside the country's longest-serving leader, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, and installing a fellow right-wing nationalist, Naftali Bennett, as the country's new leader.

The narrow vote by the 120-member Knesset, or parliament, ushered in a ruling coalition that was cobbled together from wildly disparate political parties with little in common beyond a shared desire to expel Netanyahu from the office he had held for the last 12 years.

Bennett, the new prime minister, heads a small party determined to thwart Palestinian statehood and maintain Israeli control over most of the occupied West Bank. But his government includes parties from Israel's left and center, and also marks a historic first: participation in the ruling coalition by an Islamist party representing Palestinian citizens of Israel.

Because of fundamental disagreements over the potential creation of a Palestinian state alongside the Israeli one, the government is likely to try instead to concentrate on domestic issues, including passing a national budget and embarking on an economic recovery from the COVID-19 pandemic.

Bennett is taking the top spot as part of an unusual agreement with the head of the coalition, centrist politician Yair Lapid, who would normally have assumed the country's leadership. In order to woo Bennett into his camp, Lapid offered to split the fouryear term as prime minister in half, with Bennett going first. Lapid will serve now as the foreign minister.

Netanyahu, who is on trial

Israeli protesters dance and cheer during a demonstration against Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu outside his official residence in Jerusalem on Saturday night. Israel swore in a new government Sunday, ending Netanyahu's record 12-year rule.

Naftali Bennett, shown speaking Sunday in a session of parliament, is an Orthodox Jew who has been called Israel's first religious prime for corruption, first became prime minister for three years in the 1990s and had held the top office again since 2009. That has made him the longest-serving Israeli leader, surpassing the longevity even of the country's first prime minister and primary founder, David Ben Gurion.

In recent years, many Israelis had become alarmed by an accelerating slide into autocracy by Netanyahu, who has denounced criminal court proceedings against him as a witch hunt and has tirelessly sought to undermine the legitimacy of judges, prosecutors and investigators.

Had he remained in office, Netanyahu had signaled he would use the prime minister's post as a platform to continue attacking the judiciary and probably would have tried to engineer some form of immunity from the fraud and bribery charges he is facing. Rivals also feared he would intensify his wielding of state powers in ways that would make it difficult for anyone to challenge his actions in office or hold him accountable. Along with his detractors, however, Netanyahu has maintained a devoted following whose fervor at times has bordered on obsession. Over the last two weeks, as it became apparent his grip on power was in serious jeopardy, his allies mounted a campaign of furious incitement against the new coalition, characterizing Bennett, who once served as his chief of staff, and other right-wing stalwarts as traitors to the prime minister's ideological cause.

So heated did the discourse become that the head of Israel's domestic security agency, the Shin Bet, issued an unusual warning about the dangers of hate speech, and some mainstream commentators expressed fears of an uprising on the order of the Jan. 6 insurrection at the U.S. Capitol.

Netanyahu did little to calm the rhetorical storm, but his Likud Party did promise a peaceful transfer of power.

Hours before the vote approving the new government, Netanyahu used his last speech to the Knesset as prime minister to unleash a bitter tirade at not only the rivals who ousted him, but at the Biden administration.

"An Israeli prime minister needs to be able to say 'no' to the leader of the world's superpower," he declared from the well of the Knesset, referring to his own vehement opposition to U.S. efforts to revive the landmark nuclear accord with Iran that was scrapped by President Donald Trump.

Netanyahu, now the leader of the opposition in the Knesset, is expected to remain a formidable political force.

Kinkel Continued from A1

He killed his parents the next day, and the day after that he opened fire in the school cafeteria, killing 16-year-old Ben Walker and 17-year-old Mikael Nickolauson and injuring 25 before being subdued by other students.

the time, he did not want to accept his diagnosis and felt community pressure to resolve the case rather than plead not guilty by reason of insanity. He was sentenced to nearly 112 years after apologizing profusely.

"I feel tremendous, tremendous shame and guilt for what I did," he told HuffPost. "I hate the violence that I'm guilty of."

Kinkel shot Betina Lynn in the back and foot. She told HuffPost the idea of him ever getting out is "literally terrifying." She has perma-

a constant reminder of what happened. "Even now, more than 23 years later, I and many other survivors are still deal-

nent nerve damage,

Kinkel ing with the fallout," Lynn said. "We are all serving life sentences right alongside him."

Kinkel described how he underwent mental health treatment at the youth prison where he began his sentence and recognized he harmed innocent people, including his parents, whom he loved. He also said he cried when he learned about the 1999 massacre at Columbine High School in Colorado, afraid that he had inspired it.

Fighting the sentence

Kinkel, who has obtained a college degree behind bars, continues to challenge his sentence, which was upheld by the state Supreme Court. In March, his attorneys filed a petition in federal court, arguing that his plea was not voluntary — he had been off his meds for several weeks beforehand — and that his sentence was unconstitutional.

"Sentencing a juvenile to die in prison because they suffer from a mental illness is a violation of the Eighth Amendment," his lawyers

In 2019, as part of a national effort to re-evaluate tough-on-crime sentences for juveniles, the Oregon Legislature passed a measure to stop automatically referring 15- to 17-year-olds to adult court for certain offenses and to ensure that they weren't sentenced to life in prison without a chance to seek parole. At the time, there were about a dozen people serving life or life-equivalent terms for crimes committed as juveniles.

But critics warned that the measure could lead to Kinkel's release, and a month later, lawmakers passed another bill to make clear that the measure was not retroactive.

"It doesn't matter if he was 15," Adam Walker, the brother of Kinkel's victim Ben Walker, said in a video released at the time. "The victims don't get second chances. Why should the offenders?"

Kinkel said he watched the debate in the prison library.

"It was like, there was hope," Kinkel said. "And then the Legislature ... came back and said, 'No, we are specifically, intentionally, purposely with everything that we have, going to take this away from the kids already in the system."

He said he doesn't often consider the possibility of ever being released: "I don't allow myself to spend too much time thinking about that because I think that can actually bring more suffering."
