Swimming

Swimming worked out just fine for Jones, who will gladly show off his four Olympic medals — two of them gold — and three other medals he earned at the world championships during his long career. Sadly, not nearly enough swimmers of color have followed Jones' path, which stifles the sport's ability to expand beyond the perception that it's largely confined, at least in America, to wealthy, predominately white suburbs. At the Olympic trials, where hundreds are competing for a trip to the Tokyo Games, it's impossible to ignore that hardly anyone of color is diving in.

There are a few high-profile exceptions — notably Simone Manuel, who in Rio de Janeiro became the first Black woman to win an individual gold medal in swimming, and 18-year-old Torri Huske, whose mother is Chinese — but not nearly enough, despite USA Swimming's efforts to diversify its pool of athletes. In recent years, the governing body has devoted much of its attention to the "Make a Splash" initiative, which provides opportunities for more children, especially those in underserved communities, to learn how to swim. But Tim Hinchey, president and CEO of USA Swimming, acknowledged that the racial unrest in the wake of George Floyd's death brought to light that more needed to be done. It's not enough to teach Black kids to swim, though that's a significant achievement that will serve them for the rest of their lives. Hinchey wants to make sure more kids of color view swimming as a potential avenue to college scholarships and athletic success at the highest levels. Even the Olympics. "We've realized that we're missing a piece," Hinchey said, which is "finding ways to make swimming not just something that saves your life and something that's a sport for life, which is important to all of us, but a way to convince young kids of any place, of any color, any shape, any size, any ethnicity, to know that swimming can be your sport." Over the next seven years, USA Swimming plans to divert funding that goes toward learn-to-swim programs into local clubs that are making strides to diversity the sport, such as the Chicago Park District swim team and the DeKalb Aquatics Tiger Sharks near Atlanta. The goal, according to Hinchey, is to have those two initiatives on equal financial footing by 2028. "If we can open this up to more people, we're a sport that would love to have more people in it," he said. "That's kind of our focus going forward."

Another potentially important development occurred at the pool in the wake of Floyd's killing by a Minneapolis police officer. Jones, Manuel and other Black swimmers, such as Lia Neal, who recently retired after winning two Olympic medals during her competitive career, joined together to form Team BLAC, the Black Leadership in Aquatics Coalition. The burden of being a Black person in America, not to mention a Black swimmer, can take its toll. After Manuel failed to make the U.S. team in the 100-meter freestyle Thursday night — which means she won't get a chance to defend the historic gold medal she won in Rio — she revealed that she had been diagnosed with overtraining syndrome. "I do think that being a Black person in America played a part in it," said Manuel, who still has a shot to make the team in the 50 free. "This last year for the Black community has been brutal, and I can't say that wasn't something that I saw. It's not something I can ignore. It was just another factor that can influence you mentally in a draining way." Now retired, Jones remains dedicated to breaking down the cultural stigmas that keep Black Americans from embracing the pool.
