Riley.

J. C. Garrett has traded his Bryan McKinley horse and log for a bicycle. This, we are told, was brought about through the influence of W. H. Hogan, who has taken the "craze" and desiring some one as awkward as himself to practice with, fortunate for himself but unfortunate for J. C., interested himself in the trade. J. C. came to grief in short order, landing himself in a ditch of three feet of water sustaining some injury and ending with an attack of rheumatism with which he is now laid on the shelf, and his bicycle hung on the fence for repairs. Hogan declares he had nothing to do with bringing about this sad state of affairs and explains "if children play with fire they are likely to come to grief." Bob Baker started to Burns on his wheel, but, when probably half way, punctured a tire and in puncturing the tire he also punctured himself. His wheel now radiates in the fork of a juniper near where the mishap occurred, and Bob "pedestrian-ated" back home, hitched a span of horses to his spring wagon and went to Burns, but left the poor wheel gracefully dangling from the juniper, because he was ashamed to bring it to town for repairs. Carl Cecil and Dell Dibble have not yet been effected with the bicycle mania and we give them credit for having more stamina. Hogan is thinking of entering the list at the races at Burns in September, two best in three, mile heats against the fastest horse present, but his partner, J. C., is off.
