"The Duke" to fill in forms at Semerset House, and his friend to do ditto at the India Office.

"Such is life!" groaned Lee. "When we say our adieux, how shall we frame them? How shall we account for our departure?"

"With another crammer, I suppose." replied Ned, bitterly. "I've no doubt you will have one ready 'in.' for the occasion."

"I shall merely say that the duke's family affairs call him home but that I shall not go farther than London with you, I shall hope to have the pleasure of seeing them again. Hebe Lyons is a little simpleton, or she would not have credited all our nonsense, but I should not like to lose sight of her altogether."

Softly unclosing the door, the young men listened to the hub-bub; of feminine tongues on the other side of it.

"Such a horribly dusty journey," they heard Edie say. "Cassie, Hebe, this is Mary, Mrs. Fowkes, my married sister, who has consented to chaperon all three of us, if we will promise to be awfully Prof. W. H. PEEKE, F. D., 4 Cedar St., New York good."

"Indeed, then, I shall snub her | strate the great merits of the remedy. if she takes too much upon herself," affirmed Edie, a lively brunette, with the brightest of eyes and perkiest of noses. "Have you secured rooms for us? And -oh, have you seen anything of my brother and that odious chum of his?"

"Sh sh! they are here!" replied Hebe Lyons, in tones of suppressed mirth. "We have had the rarest fun at their expense. Cassie has bad to run away some times lest

It's been killing some times: and we have bowed and bent, and fluttered with delight when his grace condescended to look at us, and believed so implicitly all the audacious falsehoods they have told us, that they look upon us as thoroughly taken

The handle of the door slipped out of Ned's fingers. At the sound the ladies fled, laughing as they went and the gulled conspirators surveyed each other ruefully.

"I shall be off to London at once," said Ned, still crimson with mortification. "Mrs. Mundy can pack my portmanteau, and send it after
