Our American shipbuilders have not been as successful in the construction of torpedo-boats as they have been in turning out larger naval vessels. Of the six torpedo boats built today, scarcely one of them has been a complete success. One of the recent boats has failed to make the speed required of her, while another met with a serious accident on her official trial, resulting in the breakdown of her engines and the serious wounding of some of her crew.

It will also be remembered that the torpedo-boat Ericsson, which was built over a year ago, had to be tried several times before she was finally accepted by the government. These failures in torpedo-boats are the more to be regretted as it was generally believed that in the matter of speed and endurance our torpedo-boats would prove superior to those owned by foreign navies. Why the boats so far constructed have proven faulty has not been divulged; but no doubt lack of experience in building these small vessels may be responsible. It is possible, however, that anxiety to complete the boats in a very short time may have led to faulty construction, and it is barely possible that in some instance inferior material may have been used.

It is to be hoped that careful tests will be made so as to determine exactly what has caused the torpedo-boats to fall short of expectations, so that the deficiency can be corrected in the case of the large number of boats now being built. The work which a torpedo boat is expected to accomplish is too important to permit of any of the vessels being of less speed or of less endurance than the boats of possible adversaries. Moreover, it is certain that this country will build a large number of torpedo-boats within the next few years, hence it is important that defects discovered in the boats already completed should be avoided for the future.

The navy department is assembling a small flotilla of six torpedo-boats for a cruise during the winter into Southern waters. This cruise is for the purpose of familiarizing officers and men with the handling of torpedo-boats under service conditions.

Several sportsmen were talking over their adventures in the hunting field, when one of them told about shooting a duck, to the foot of which a clam was attached by a death grip. As the bird was killed about two miles from salt water, it had evidently flown that distance with the clam fastened to its foot. Another said that while walking along the ocean beach he had noticed a gull in trouble a short distance from the shore and found that a large crab had caught it by the foot. He secured both the gull and the crab, after separating them, returned each to its natural element. The next man told about seeing gulls flying into the air with clams and then dropping them a long distance on the hard beach, by which means they were broken open. Still another, who had met with no strange adventures, said the last story reminded him of a story he had found in his Latin reader, about an eagle taking a tortoise up in the air to let it drop a rock to crush it, but rocks and tortoises being scarce in that region, he, with an aim aimed, dropped it on the bold head of an old Roman philosopher, and dashed his brains out. It was not stated whether the tortoise was injured or not. The persons who had the other stories at once expressed their disbelief of this ancient chestnut. Another of the party remarked that he thought it not unreasonable, as there were doubtless some pretty good lars even in days of the Romans.

The story has been told of how Jimmy McNamie, the lucky Klondike millionaire, fell in love with Lily Anderson, a pretty nurse girl whom he met on the schooner Fred E. Snyder from St. Michaels, Alaska, of how the first mate disputed her affections with him, and how the millionaire compromised by agreeing to send the girl to school for two years, with the privilege of choosing a husband for herself at the end of that time.

But the newly made millionaire could not wait two years. He had an old sweetheart at Bartlett Springs, Colo., but he never reached her. He was on the marry and brooked no delay.

At Seattle McNamie found a woman known as Frankie Nelson who was willing to marry. When they applied for a license they were shy the two witnesses required by law, and the license was not issued. The woman used much plain English very volubly, but the clerk would not yield.

Next day McNamie found a girl of his own name, Miss Mary Ellen McNamie, of Seattle, who was willing to change to Mrs. McNamie. He got his witnesses together and they were wed that evening.
