Typhoid Fever.

Typhoid fever is due to the swallowing and subsequent growth in the intestine, of the bacillus typhosus. These bacilli, lodge usually in the small intestine, multiply so rapidly that the blood and internal organs are full of them.

Their length is one-thousandth part of an inch. They survive freezing; will live in bed-linen for two months and in surface soil for six, but die in a heat near the boiling point and in three hours of sunshine. They have lived for more than a year in air-tight bottles of soup.

A large majority of all cases come from the contamination of a well through underground communications with a cesspool in which typhoid discharges have been thrown or from the running into it of surface water. Any well within 200 feet of a vault is a source of great danger. Less important sources of infection are, poisoning of milk and vegetables by water from polluted wells and by flies carrying typhoid excrement and smearing it on the food. When you think of the fact that it would take 1000 of these germs, laid lengthwise to cover one-eighth of an inch and that one of them swallowed will establish the disease, it is easy to believe that one may be carried in the air pump or hairy cushion of a fly's foot.--Ex.

Lawen, Oct 7th 1901.

Editor Times-Herald:--In your issue of Sept. 28, I see that you state that my wife was a witness in the D. S. Graves case. Please permit me to say through your valuable columns that she was not a witness, nor did she know anything about the case, yet she knew as much as many who testified in that case.

Respectively,
Adam George.
