

COYOTES DOMESTICATED.

Part-breed coyote dogs have long been in use among ranchers and others in isolated locations as watch animals, but it is believed that Charles Lubeck of Elk City is the first rancher to be able to convert full-blooded coyotes to any use about a farm.

"Brig and Harrison caught these, all of them," said Lubeck yesterday. "I never have to kill a single coyote with a gun, for these animals are always capable of doing the work and of keeping their brothers out of the country about the ranch."

"I caught two coyotes 25 years ago, and since that time there have been five generations, until the result has been that I have been able to develop what might nearly be called domestic coyotes. While I cannot allow these animals to sleep in the house, I have a special place for them, and they run at large with the dogs. They can put up a better fight than any dog I own, and they are absolutely sure as watch animals. They do not bark, and their howlings are only occasional. When they are about the house at night I have little trouble with them, though of course I never let them get in."

"With the first two or three generations of the animals I had some difficulty in keeping them about the place. The first pair I caught were never allowed to run wild. I had to keep them penned up all the time. The second generation of the animals I let run at times and often they would leave the ranch and not return for several days. But I gradually trained them year after year, until they were as easy to teach as dogs and far better for many purposes."

"Every generation of the animals becomes more valuable than their parents have been before them, and within the next ten years I hope to have a pair of coyotes which will be good to keep in the house."

"There is one point which a person raising coyotes must never lose sight of, and that is the fact that the wild streaks will show themselves when they are least expected, and the animals will often snap even those with whom they are on the most friendly terms."

"These coyotes are a year old, and they have not bitten anyone yet."

Lubeck has the animals chained while in the city.—Statesman.

Prof. Campbell's new paper is a monthly, chock full of good things, the only paper of its kind in the world, and it embodies the results of the editor's many years of painstaking investigation of the soil tillage proposition.
