

MEN I HAVE SKETCHED.

(Copyright, 1911, Homer Davenport Syndicate) I had an excellent chance to study and sketch Mr. Harriman when he appeared at the celebrated hearing before the Interstate Commerce Commission in 1907.

It was amusing to note the audience at the Harriman hearing, half of which looked like the late Cornelius Vanderbilt and the other half was made up of people with long-legged cameras that reminded me of the oil wells of Los Angeles.

"No, we got only $180,000,000 for —" It reminded me of the time I heard Collis P. Huntington testify in an investigation at Washington that he forgot a trifle like five millions and never could remember fractions of a million.

At the time of the Harriman hearing he had gotten hold of so many of the railroads that the few outside of his warm grasp didn't worry him much, and he probably had his plans pretty well made to get as many more as he wanted whenever he needed them.

If as a boy you have ever watched a crawfish handle his prongs and feelers, you can imagine Mr. Harriman on the witness stand. The crawfish will back up when he must, but only in the direction to suit him, and only toward one of his holes where he can get away. Mr. Harriman was not used to answering questions and showed a desire all the time to put questions instead of answering them and, when questions were asked that evidently he would like to avoid his crawfish like feelers, his mustache wings, would rise and fall and some strands would remain up in protest.

"Won't you let me tell you all about the Chicago and Alton?" He had about the best shaped head I ever saw and his face was full of character. His forehead might fumble the ball, but the back of the head would be backing up third base so that no one would have a chance to score. His features played team work. If you ever caught a glimpse of a weasel's eye peering out from under a rail-pile or from under a hen house you know the kind of sharp eyes Harriman had, and, though the lids were heavy and the brows quite heavy, no one worried about his overlooking anything.

But his mustache and what was around it was the real feature of the Harriman face. This mustache was identical with that of three classes of men—the Forty-niner, the old soldier, and the fellow in the orchestra that plays the French horn. I don't pretend to know why, but all such persons have the same mustache or goatee. These mustaches invariably exhibit the drop curve and the in-shot and are never seen alone. They are always accompanied by small frightened-looking goatees. The wrinkles around Harriman's mouth were out of the ordinary and all worked on the double-track system. Expressions came on one and went on another track. The mustache and goatee concealed any smile that might lurk around when he forgot a transaction involving thirty or forty millions.

Like all great railroad men, Mr. Harriman dressed very plainly. In fact there was nothing but simplicity about his make-up, but it looked like the simplicity of a "Gould coupler." It revealed a certain strength. A small early grass-green bow tie was almost lost in the lay-down collar, and his shoes, not new, didn't look as if he ever walked on them except where the Brussels were real and thick. He "shot his cuffs," like monologue artists and clerks, but otherwise was perfectly at ease on the witness stand.

As a whole, he was a remarkable example of power and of clear, crafty thinking. He couldn't be caught with any trap baited with cheese—it would have to be with a mink trap with a real live duck.

One of his right-hand men, John C. Stubbs, sums up his chief's personality when he says: "Strange as it may seem, Mr. Harriman never worried; but he thought in bed, and this is what killed him. He worked all day and thought out his problems at night."

I made many cartoons of Mr. Harriman. One series showed him in company with H. H. Rogers, and I pictured them as minstrel men named Hen and Ed, one with the tambourine and the other with the banjo.

Just after one of these cartoons I was invited to Washington by Uncle Joe Cannon to a dinner that he was giving to the Gridiron Club in exchange for favors and food rendered him. Many of the railroad men and cartoonists of the country were there as invited guests, and it seemed to be Uncle Joe's delight to personally introduce people that he thought were in different business spheres. When he introduced me to Mr. Harriman, saying we were to go into dinner together, I remarked that I recognized Mr. Harriman from his cartoon last week with Rogers. Mr. Harriman evidently did not catch my name at first, or if he caught the name possibly did not associate so striking a figure as mine with the lowly cartoons of the week before. He was noticeably flushed at my remark that I recognized him from his caricatures, and he showed a little temper until someone evidently whispered in his ear, so when it was time for us to march in to the feed he was most kindly, and knowing my failing for horses, immediately began to bridge any gap that had been widened by telling me of his horse John R. Gentry.—Homer Davenport.
