

MEN I HAVE SKETCHED.

eyes from age. Mr. Gladstone slapped the dog gently on the side with his cane chiding him that he was so old he had lost his manners. The dog really looked older than Mr. Gladstone but less so.

A butler had now come to my side and I was reaching for the letter I had written when Mr. Gladstone reached me and took the letter which I was about to hand to the butler. He opened and read to the point I guess where I mentioned I had come from Silverton, Oregon, and looking at the signature he said, "I hope, Sir Mr. Davenport, you have not come all the way from Oregon to see me, Sir." I was about to let the conversation drop before it had commenced as I was lost temporarily in admiration of such wonderful features. The huge dark eyes, then the famous collar and tie, to say nothing of the whiskers, which looked as if they had been tied on with a string.

Realizing that it was up to me I said, "Yes, Mr. Gladstone, I have." He answered, "Indeed you must be very fond of traveling." Another pause, when I realized the conversation was dragging again until it had created a dust. I then said, "Mr. Gladstone, your chief product here seems to be crows." "Crows?" he asked, in an inquiring tone. "Yes, I said, "The black ones, like those that have just lit back of you." He looked at me in utter amazement. Slapping his cane he exclaimed, "Rooks!" After that our conversation dwindled rapidly. The cabman had shown a great deal of uneasiness on top of the hansom. I had run over those most distinguished features so thoroughly in my mind that I thought they were mine. To carry the conversation further would reveal more ignorance on my part. So I came to an agreeable end. I re-entered the hansom cab and was rapidly driven away. Once out of the ground I asked the cabman to stop so that I might jot down the lines of those features before any faded from my memory. The cabman was evidently peeping through the top hole in the hansom, for when I reminded him I was ready to hurry ahead, so I could catch the first train in the morning, he said, "Aye, aye, sir, we will be off, but if I knew you were going to bring the grand old man away with us," he said, I might have charged you with a two-seater.

I believe Mr. Gladstone's was the most remarkable of all the faces I have ever drawn, yet when I see the few lines that it takes to reproduce his features I am at a loss to find what the fascination was in his face. I think his eyes were a steel blue with very large dark pupils, as I find a foot note on my sketch made at that time saying that the pupils of his eyes were as big as dimes and another hurriedly written note saying that his neck tie was as large as a four-odd boy's pants. There was a transparency to his skin, shown especially in his hands, that gave it the appearance of wax.

Mr. Gladstone was embarrassed and you were instinctively impressed that had he been isolated on a desert island as a young man, nothing could have prevented him from attaining great heights so strongly was his marvellous character stamped on his features. His voice as he spoke to me gave me a thrill owing to the personality that seemed to be living in reserve. It seems a shame to talk with such a voice. It sounds as it was only made for use in the halls of Parliament.

Reaching London at dark and going to Julian Ralph, a man of vast newspaper knowledge—a reporter supposed to be the best in the world. He listened to my story with intent interest. True, he now and then bit his under lip to hold back a roar of laughter, yet he made no signs of outward agony until I came to the place where I told Mr. Gladstone his chief product must be crows. Here it seems Ralph tried to tip over in his best chair, telling me, when he regained consciousness, that there was nothing Gladstone was so proud of as his rooks and crows and to think that a raw, unsophisticated, uncouth western farmer had called them crows, was too awful to consider.—Homer Davenport.

"It is a pleasure to tell you that Chamberlain's Cough Remedy is the best cough medicine I have ever used," writes Mrs. Hugh Campbell, of Lavonia, Ga. "I have used it with all my children and the results have been highly satisfactory." For sale by all dealers.
