MEN I HAVE SKETCHED.

(Copyright, 1911, Homer Davenport Syndicate)

For many years I have been studying the national Senate from the press gallery, beginning in 1896. Owing to the distance from the gallery to the main body of the chamber, one can scarcely make an accurate study of features in minute detail, but the shadows cast from the light overhead many times afford an opportunity to study the features in the shade which in some instances is more effective than the impressions one gets closer to them.

It might seem strange, but there was but one figure in the whole of the United States Senate during the nineties that was reminiscent of the atmosphere of Lincoln and the heroic days of the nation. It was that of a venerable old gentleman who suggested now and then in his gestures and bearings an American eagle. He was very deliberate, yet very nervous. He looked the part of a United States Senator when you consider the dignity which should go with the position. I never made but one sketch of him, and that was on a memorable occasion when his face and figure seemed to show more sadness and yet more determination than I had ever seen in him. In the shadows of his face that day I could see much the same power noticeable in his distinguished brother, the General. The man was John Sherman, of Ohio. It was the day he walked into the Senate to view it for the last time, to look at the seat he had so long occupied with great distinction, but from which he had been trapped in as cold blooded a spirit as a mouse-trap was ever set. He had been hauled out of it by a seat in the Cabinet in order that the vacancy left in the Senate could be used by the politicians. It was quickly filled by the election of Mark Hanna, and Sherman became Secretary of State.

After a few weeks in the Cabinet he received the intimation that he was incapacitated for the duties of the place by reason of advanced years and failing memory. How true this was, and whether or not he was unequal to the task, was never quite clear, but it served as an excuse, so he was let out of the cabinet.

Embarrassment and disappointment weighed on the old statesman's mind, and soon brought about a sickness which carried him off. John Sherman literally died of a broken heart.

I don't know why, yet I find that the sketch herewith reproduced, I have always cherished more than any of the hosts of others in which I have pictured politicians. I was presented to him once by his nephew. At close range his features suggested the warrior of an early day. His remarks to me relative to caricature were kindly and at many times humorous, and showed the keenest knowledge and appreciation of the cartoonist's art. He discussed Sir John Tenniel of Punch, Thomas Nast and Joseph Kepler, and told of how Lincoln laughed over the atrocious pictures made of him by Tenniel during the Civil War. He particularly dwelt on the fact that a caricature or cartoon, unless it hit, had little power.—Homer Davenport.

The Mothers' Club bazaar will be held Dec. 8 and 9 this year in the big north store room of The Times-Herald building, provided it is not occupied by a permanent tenant on those dates. The ladies will have six booths this year and are ambitious to make exceptional sales as they have purchased a strip of land adjoining the play grounds that must be paid for.

WINTER WORK IN BREEDING.

Those interested in the breeding of horses, pigs, dairy cattle, sheep, and beef cattle will be given opportunity to get the greatest amount of scientific instruction in the shortest possible time this winter in the short course of the Oregon Agriculture College. Prof. E. L. Potter and his assistant, George L. Sampson, have rearranged the work so that instead of separate courses in breeding, feeding, judging and like matters, each including information as to all these animals, the course on horses, for instance, will contain instruction in all these points. Thus the man who is a horse dealer will not have to sit through lectures dealing with pigs and sheep, but can get exactly what he wants. The college farm droves and herds will be used for demonstration and judging during the courses.

"There could be no better medicine than Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. My children were all sick with whooping cough. One of them was in bed, had a high fever and was coughing up blood. Our doctor gave them Chamberlain's Cough Remedy and the first dose eased them, and three bottles cured them," said Mrs. C. A. Donaldson, of Lexington, Miss. For sale by all dealers.
