POLITICS AND INDUSTRY.

The non-taxpaying element—those who own no property or business—are constantly engaged in the promotion of new theories of government and there has developed in this country a mania for the regulation of private business by restrictive laws. The enactment and the operation of these laws cost money and help to pile up the tax rate, but despite all of the new regulations and restrictions the cost of living has constantly increased, so that both the taxpayer and the non-taxpayer have been hurt.

It is frankly admitted by one element—the socialist—that it is their aim to tax property until private ownership will no longer be possible. That it is their intention to take away the savings of the industrious and the thrifty and have everything under public ownership and control. And this gradually being done through political manipulation.

The tendency to follow propaganda of this kind is growing and is taken up by politicians who pander to every movement that bears the ear marks of popularity. The only reason for this is that the opponents of business and property rights represent an organized force in politics, while business, politically, represents on force.—Washington State Weekly.

The Kaiser's partnership with Golt on the western front is rather distracting his mind from his alliance with Mahomet on the eastern line.

One of our new boats has been named the Licking. Whether or not it proves a desirable name will depend whether it gives or takes.
