THE PRIVILEGED OBJECTOR.
Returning American soldiers are inclined to be critical about the politeness with which so-called conscientious objectors are being treated. And their attitude seems to be, in a measure, justified. They have heard and read abundantly about the appreciation with which America has viewed their heroism in the face of hardships too heavy for blasphemy and dangers too appalling for description. And now they are beginning to look for the proofs of it. And when they learn that 135 objectors have been released from Camp Funston with an honorable discharge, they begin to suspect that some one has been kidding them.
