LISTEN TO THE CHOIR

We are informed by an estimable public official that at Monterey recently a number of Mexicans joined him in singing the Star Spangled Banner. This fact he presents as proof that the Mexicans are an amiable people and do not make border raids.

Unfortunately, the best that it can prove is that there are some Mexicans who do not make border raids—while they are singing the Star Spangled Banner with this estimable official. But while they were thus fraternizing there were other Mexicans who were murdering an American and subjecting his wife to gasty brutalities.

It does not prove that all Mexicans are amiable. It does not prove that any of them are. Singing the Star Spangled Banner is not proof of a lofty impulse. It may be camouflage. But, at best, what is the use of a few of them singing the S. S. B. at Monterey while there are swarms of them elsewhere just waiting for an opportunity to slit an American throat and pillage American property?

We are supposed to be friendly with Carranza's government. He has an army of about 60,000, and claims to rule a population of 15,000,000.

That population contains several rebel factions, each with pretensions to the control of certain portions of Mexico. Any politeness which we may show to the Carranza government—any act of official recognition—is tantamount to a slur on the claims of all of the other factions. And one or more of these factions retaliate by murdering a few more Americans. It is safer than to murder some of Carranza's party.

As a matter of fact, about the safest thing any one can do in Mexico is to murder an American and brutalize his wife and daughters.

And our amiable public official assumes a benevolent attitude and solemnly assures us that Mexicans sang the S. S. B. with him. The wonder is that they failed to slit his throat at the last word.
