CAULIFLOWER HAS BEST GROWTH ON MOIST SOILS

(From Department of Industrial Journalism Oregon Agricultural College.)

Cauliflower is one of the most sensitive vegetables to unfavorable growing conditions, and the better it is understood the better the results will be.

The soil is the most important factor in raising the plant. When the soil is in a rich loamy condition, full of humus or organic matter, it will naturally produce a fine large plant which is usually responsible for a good head. Cauliflower requires an unusual amount of soil moisture and responds best where it is possible to irrigate during the dry summer period.

The best seeds are imported from Europe. The cheap seed is worthless and a good uniform field of first grade heads can come only from a high grade seed strain. The good seed also produces a large, solid, white head on a short stem on which the leaves of the head fold closely about, thus protecting it from weather conditions before marketing.

Cultivation is necessary to keep the ground from losing moisture during the growing season. At intervals of 10 days from the time the plant is planted it is carefully cultivated until the growing season is over. Where irrigation is practiced, water is applied often enough to keep a uniform amount of moisture in the soil, thus insuring a steady growth of the plant.

The best way to do this is to run the water between the rows rather than to use the overhead sprinkling system.

Is it cold enough? ? ?
