BY JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS.

From The Century:

"How did Polly know?" Chadwick inquired.

"Danny Lemmons tol' 'er."

"By George!" exclaimed Chad Lemmons."

"Why, bless your heart," said carrying out the jealous whim of a Spurlock, "he thes swarms aroun' here."

"I see he's ketched you Iser!," remarked Uncle Billy with a twinkle in his eye. "He 'lowed las' night as how he'd fetch you back wi' him."

"Yes," said Israel, "he thes crope up behind me. Its mighty hard for to fool these army fellers.

Then and afterward the whole family pretended to regard Spur lock as Chadwick's prisoner. This was not a joke for the latter to relish, but it was evidently not intended to be offensive, and he could not do less than humor it. He accepted the situation philosofically. He even prepared himself to relish Captain Moseley's astonishment when he returned and discovered the true state of affairs. As the day were away it occured to Chadwick that that the captain was in no hurry to return. Even Uncle Billy Powers grew uneasy.

"Now, I do hope and trust he ain't gone and lost his temper up thar in the woods," remarked Uncle Billy. "I hope it from the bottom of my heart. These here wars and rumors of wars makes the folks mighty restless. They'll take resks now what they wouldn't dassent to of tuck before this here rippit begun, an' it's done got so now that human life ain't wuth shucks. The boys up here ain't no better 'n the rest. They fly to pieces quicker 'n they ever did."

No trouble, however, had come to Captain Moseley. Though he was confused in his bearings, he was as serene and as unruffled as when training a company of raw conscripts in the art of war. After an unsuccessful attempt to find the road he gave his horse the rein, and that sensible animal, his instinct sharpened by remembrance of Un cle Powers' corn-crib and fodder. moved about at random until he found he was really at liberty to go where he pleased, and then he turned short about, struck a little canter, and was soon going down the road by which he had come. The captain was as proud of this feat as if it were due to his own intelligence, and he patted the horses in an approving way.

As Captain Moseley rode down Tonic, although I had them 16 years. the mountain, reflecting, it occured to him that his expedition was taking a comical shape. He had gone marching up the hill, and now he came marching down again, and Israel Spurlock, so far as the captain knew, was as far from being a captive, as ever-perhaps farther. Thinking it all over in a somewhat irritated frame of mind, Moseley remembered Lovejoy's eagerness to re-capture Spurlock. He remembered, also, what he had heard the night before, and it was in no pleas ant mood that he thought it all wick. "the woods is full of Danny over.
