How She Told It.

One of the effects of a little education, without much thinking with it, is to make people expert in exaggerating. There are many young people, educated in our schools, who make use of their acquaintance with words to pile them up uselessly in description.

We say their acquaintance with words, not their knowledge of them; for when one really knows words, he does not often misuse them. He does not, for instance, call a large apple a "mostrous" one, because he knows that an apple may be large without either being misshapen or unnatural; nor would he call a mutton chop "elegant" because he found it tender.

Let us take an instance of the misuse of a little education in this way. Bertha Brown is a high school girl, who is reckoned bright at school and who has had many social advantages. The other day, meeting one of her companions on the street, she grasped her by both hands and burst into this speech:

"Oh, Edith Jones! You can't possibly imagine what a perfectly immense, gorgeous time we had last night at that enchanting Mrs. Snodgrass! She has a perfectly mammoth, palatial house, you know—three stories high, and such a gigantic dining-room and the most fascinating love of a piazza!

"Well, we had an enormous dinner—beautiful mushrooms, and some monstrous peaches and the most seraphic ice cream and that sort of thing—and then some music on the piazza that was just too huge and heavenly for anything! Sophie Ives was there with that perfectly magnificent banjo of hers and played a dazzling fandango on it.

"And then Billy Grave played ineffably on his jewsharp—did you ever hear anything so utterly preposterous as playing on a jewsharp? But it was sublime, anyway, the way he played on it.

"Ethel Smith had just played an immense little caprice on the piano, when who should come in but that awfully odious Mr. Tompkins, and he began talking everlastingly about social problems, and that sort of thing, in the most agonizing way.

"It was absolutely insufferable, and we were all simply paralyzed with death, and—"

Fortunately for Edith Jones, her father came along at that moment and relieved her from the necessity on listening to any more of Bertha's superlatives.

Bertha had not been conscious that she was using bad English or telling any untruths in the speech she had been making. She had been well trained in grammar, and did not wilfully tell a falsehood. She thought she was simply relating, in a lively way, actual occurrences of the day before.

People that talk in this exaggerated and inexact way do not realize that the most forcible language is always the simplest, and that no word is effective if it is used out of place.—Youth's Companion.

Kiowa's Woman Mayor in Disfavor.

Kiowa, Kan., Oct. 16.—Mrs. Paxton, the Mayor of the town, has been asked to resign because of her persistent crusade against liquor selling. The request comes in the shape of a petition to that effect signed by business men who feel that their interests are injured by the crusade. Much of their trade come from cattlemen, who, as a rule, are not in sympathy with prohibition.

Mrs. Mayor Paxton has kept up a continual war on the saloons, and recently she sent out a lot of special deputy city marshals to destroy all liquors and nail up the doors. An attorney was employed to fight the order, and it was then found that Kiowa had no ordinance empowering the Mayor to close the saloons.

Then followed the petition asking Mrs. Paxton to resign. Her husband's name is said to be attached to it.

A Minister's Ruse.

One Chas. Wagner of Santa Fe, was very anxious to marry the daughter of one Mrs. Miera, but the mother, who was a Catholic, objected because Wagner was a divorced man. She was willing, however, for the marriage provided a priest could be found to perform the ceremony. He went to Denver and called on Minister Brandt, who for consideration consented to shave off his business personate a priest, and deceive Wagner's prospective mother-in-law. The deception was made easy by the fact that Mrs. Miera does not know the English language. The ceremony was performed, and Wagner and Miss Miera made one and the same. But after the deception was made public it caused quite a sensation in religious circles.

For Cleveland

There was one dominant fact demonstrated above all others at the great democratic gathering of Wednesday evening at the Tabernacle, and that was Grover Cleveland's popularity over all competitors. When his name was mentioned the applause was instantaneous, general, spontaneous, thunderous and direct from their hearts of the immense audience.—Sunday Welcome.

Ex President Cleveland and Governor Hill addressed an immense meeting in New York city on the questions of the campaign for governor in that state. Both were well received, and were given an enthusiastic reception upon their appearance on the stage.
