A Place in the World for Every Wo-

From Harper's Bazar.

The woman who complains that she has no place in the world has only to open her eyes, and in most instances she will readily see what is waiting for her. The fact that she does not like that particular field is no argument against its usefulness for her. Patience Strong, detained at home by an untoward accident when the long-wished for European tour was about to become s reality, found opportunities by the score for useful service. If no home duties call, the sign is plain that in some broader field there is, in a happier sense of the work, a career to be sought. The cultivation of some talent may be destined to bring pleasure or profit, The student has a boundless field before him. To many a secluded one the Chantauqua reading courses have proved sources of untold almost unending delight. If the necessity of self support exists. there is a large place for a single woman Good nurses, teachers a effec artists, musicians, writers, dress makers, and workers in a dozen more lines of industry are always ars, alm in demand. None but the ineffi cient or the unfaithful ordinarily need complain of lack of employment.

With some there is great unwillingness to accept the place for which they have special fitness. The adept in the womanly art of needlework who despising her talent, as pires to the rewards of an artist's skill, while lacking fitness for such a position. Success is to be expected in the line of one's abilities, not al vays in the line of one's desires. Discontent oecause genius or great power has been denied is simply an impious fault-finding with the Cre ator's plan. If all women were great musicians, where were the needle-workers? If all excelled in ministering to the sick, where would we seek our works of art and tasteful decorations? Willing to be placed where one can accomplish) most, always means happiness and contentment. The oft-quoted apo thegm, "There is always room at the top," is worthy of the author of Proverbs. "Place aux dames" is the top," is worthy of the author of the watchword of the century. The single woman, better than her married sister-because, ordinarily she has more freedom-is in a position to reap the advantages of the bour. Let her exult in her herit-) So age, and not allow a complaint to pass her lips, in this closing decade NO of the nineteenth century that there is no place for her.
