Mrs. Jones.
 "Great Scott woman!" said Jones as rattle-tang, pell mell, clatter clatter, money, tobacco, keys, buttons, pipe and marbles fell to the floor making noise enough to startle anyone, almost, into a jim-i ny fit, the marbles rolling in every direction, the same of two dollars and a half in silver half dollar peices, which Jones had collected the day previous from a subscriber, you would have thought from the noise and clatter of that silver there was enough to buy out the "Roth-child's" and to make matters worse Jones had told his wife just an hour or two before, when she asked for a dollar to buy her a new calico gown, that he hadn't had a cent since the election. Hence the exclamation at the beginning Jones knew he would have to do something to circumvent the rising ire of his wife caused by him declaring he had no money. "Can you never learn how to handle a coat, vest or pair of pants to prevent the contents of the pockets from falling out? just like a woman" You see Jones' pants (much the worse from wear) had worn through where he could not see the want of a patch himself but every one else could, and you know an editor can not afford an extra pair so it was necessary for him to divest himself of this part of his wearing apparel enough to have his wife repair damages.
 "Jones," said she, as down on her knees she went, grabbing and looking for the money, the balance of the pocket contents un-noticed,
 "how could you?"
 "What," said Jones.
 "Tell me such an awful story," said she.
 "I don't understand you," said he, "I know a woman cannot take hold of a pair of breeches, except at the end of the legs spilling everything from the pockets and raising 'ned' generally your awkwardness is proverbial and belongs to the sex."
 "You know very well what I mean," said she, and the little woman was actually crying to think her husband would tell her an untruth, "you told me not two hours ago that you did not have a dollar."
 "Well my dear," said he, "I forgot indeed, I forgot," you know when a man tells his wife a lie, if caught, has to tell a least a dozen more to get out of it, "it's so seldom I get any money that it clear slipped my mind. "Now," said he,
 "the next time you take hold of a pair of pants catch them by the waistband."
 "So as to avoid," said she, "unpleasant discoveries."
 "And," said Jones, "a vest or coat by the collar."
 "Yes," said his wife, "or the spilling of the contents may disclose more important somethings than even money, letters in a ladies hand write or worse a photograph, which would, really, be somewhat harrowing to the husband's feelings."
 "Oh you women are eternally imagining something," said Jones, "generally without cause, to hold as a scepter over our heads, to excuse your own waywardness."
 "Our waywardness," said she,
 "Jones don't you feel little? just to think when I have but one decent dress my husband refuses me the paltry sum of a dollar to buy a new calico to make one. Our waywardness! Is that any excuse for your falsehoods? How could you so deceive me? If you deceive your wife in one particular, you are likely to do so in many, and then mean enough to enjoy your triumph over your trusting, truthful and much imposed on wife. A man has no shame."

 "No, nor money," said Jones,
 "when his wife can get hold of it."
 "I am sure," said she, "it is very little of your money I spend, the wives of our town are imposed upon by their husbands and in many ways basely deceived I shall bring this subject before our next meeting and discuss—"here she paused.
 "The latest imaginary scandal," said Jones, "in which some of your amiable sisters prominently figured."
 "Jones," said she, "you would provoke a saint, I wouldn't have your old dollar, nor a new dress from you. I'll not be be-holding to you for anything so there now."
 "Indeed my dear," said Jones, "you look very becoming in your old one handsome enough, quite, for me, all women are handsome and so very alluring that men don't pay much attention to their apparel." This oil of flattery on the troubled waters had the desired effect.
 "Nebby dear," said she, "wont you go with me to lodge to night some of the ladies are going to read essays, and I know the meeting will be very interesting and every one present be agreeably entertained."
 "Oh yes," said Jones, "I will go to please you, the essays will be of course, on the wonderful, self sacrificing and unselfish virtues of women, their ready allegiance to their husband's authority, the fickleness and perverseness of the male fraternity and end by saying it is an outrage to deprive women the use of the ballot."
 "No such a thing," said Mrs.
 Jones, "and if it should be the case it would be nothing more than justice to our sex, your tantalizing arrogant nature is enough to instigate women to take any and all advantages to get even with you. You set on the street corners, whittle and argue politics, take the few weak points of women and pick them to pieces, oh! as I said last week, ignorance is a bliss, and you men are full of it."
 "Well, well," said Jones, "if you will let me'll go with you this evening, provided the barber, Ed Walton, will scrape my face so as to rid it of the gray beard and make me look as young as possible, you know I wish to look well in the presence of so many ladies."
 "Pouff!" said she going to the door, "I don't suppose one of them will notice you. Oh Jones! Jones! come here! Goodness patience alive! our pigs are out, what will Mr.
 Stenger say if he see's them after all I've said and written about his old sow destroying the hen nests of Mrs Geer? Come, come! get the boys let's get them back in the pen quick."
