If the calm assurance and sharpness of children were always carried into later years, what a scintillating mass of humanity we would be.

There is a well-known Kenwood physician who possesses a son of 6 who slides out of unpleasant situations with a sang froid which is enviable. The other day at the breakfast table this youngster in the course of his remarks mentioned the fact that when he grew up he should smoke cigarettes just like a certain admired cousin did. The mention of cigarettes in the presence of this small boy's father is equivalent to setting alight a gunpowder fuse.

"Will," he said, sharply and forcibly, "if I ever catch you smoking a cigarette I'll—I'll thrash you!"

Rebuke from the paternal source are rare and a noisy silence became manifest. Then the philosopher of 6 looked up undaunted with his cheery smile. "Well," he said, sweetly, without the faintest touch of impudence, "perhaps by that time I'll be big enough to thrash you!"

His father did not prolong the argument—Chicago News.
